Location involves land and many white squarish structures.
There are large numbers of people here engaged in violent activity. They are hot and sweaty, what they are doing is dangerous, creates high adrenalin levels, causes them to feel exhilarated but also tense. Sense of combat. Impression of a person being held dejected in a room within sound of extensive gunfire. Person feels reasonably well---like he's finally recuperating after an extremely critical and stressful period.
People who are normally pressuring/oppressing him are preoccupied in the ongoing activity elsewhere. The person is lightly guarded, and is not going anywhere. He is bored, but also beyond any feeling of being apprehensive. He feels like "they can't do anything" that hasn't been done to discourage him, depress him, or cause him to give up hope or to despair. Individual is feeling cantankerous and obstinate, cooperating as little as possible---not so much anymore out of a sense of duty as just to give "these people" a hard time and get their goat. He pretends to despise his captors but secretly has a grudging respect for them. This person's existence has pretty much become a side issue that no one much cares about at the moment. They've got other, more pressing things on their minds. He's continually pre-occupied with how he might get away. Individual seems to be in a room on a 2nd or 3rd floor that once had windows that now have been sealed up. There's a door entering on a hall leading to stairs going into interior of lower floors and eventually to a door leading to the street. Going out that way is not a good idea since not streets in he area are sage; getting loose out there would be no better, and probably worse, than being stuck here. Person is on mildly friendly terms wit his guard; is dressed in a light, perhaps khaki shirt, "like" a bush shirt, is sitting in a chair rocking back and forth in it.
