Initial site impressions involve a built-up area with a specific structure that is white, masonry in construction, two floors above ground, with a courtyard sort of area to the side which itself is bounded on the opposite side by another structure. The structure of interest has what seems to be a red or reddish-brown curved-tile roof which is close to being flat. In front of the structure, which further has the sense of having originally been intended as a residence, is a narrow street or alley, with "like" cobblestone paving. Structures across the street and on either side abut or are contiguous one with another. Inside the structure of interest it is dirty and virtually empty of furniture. There are stairs to the second floor. On the second floor are two to three rooms and an open area. In one of the rooms are at least two people, maybe one or two more; one at least is ~~holding his head in his hands~~. There is an ~~atmosphere of boredom~~ and of ~~waiting for something~~ indeterminate to finally happen, but it is ~~waiting~~ because the timetable, if any is unknown, and whatever is expected could happen now or never, or anywhere in between. The general neighborhood is ~~quiet~~, and feels under-populated--not quite ~~abandoned~~, but those who live here avoid being in the open when possible and do not congregate in groups. There is a person on the roof of the neighboring structure "as if" he were ~~guarding~~, is bored with ~~watching~~, but knows that he's necessary because you never know when something might happen.

A nearby structure of interest is old, domed, rounded, white, masonry, white, with arches; inside it is cool, dim, with sunstreaks shining in. Impression of it being a mosque in a ~~heavily congested~~ urban area with tall structures in the background. Somewhere in the vicinity is the impression of an ~~amorphous~~ "storage" structure suggestive of a water tank on stilts. In front of the domed structure is an open "plaza" area that is flat, approximately rectangular, cobbled. Structure of interest is only a few blocks from this nearby structure. It is located in a place that is not where one would reasonably expect it to be; not where interested parties would be likely to search for it.
