Summary of Information

Vessel seems to be a small to medium motor ship of some type. It is some sort of working vessel, rather than a pleasure craft. There are booms and masts, <sup>hoists</sup> and a large array of cables moving past each other diagonally, together with much deck clutter and machinery. There are at least two sections to the superstructure, one apparently atop the other, and roof lines and dividing lines between superstructure layers curve inward, like some sort of combing. There are several round portholes in the upper section of the superstructure. Superstructure is predominantly white or very light in color. A pale yellow color is also present.

A cue of "contraband" brought the impression of two types-- one is grey-green, musty, leafy, with a flat, dry, choking sort of taste (suggesting, of course, marijuana); the other is lumpy, hard, and crumbly, crystalline, and white, reminiscent of hard, lumpy sugar or salt where quantities of small, damp crystals have lumped together & dried that way. It has a caustic taste, smell & feel, and is sharp and bitter. The grey-green stuff appears to be enclosed in more or less loose oblong brick-shaped portions and wrapped individually in a shiny, grey translucent plastic material. The white stuff is in large, heavy-duty plastic bags/liners inside stiff-walled containers that seem to be rounded, suggesting large cardboard drums or barrels. Large, stiff boxes may be used as well, though that seems less certain. Material in question is being carried in what seems to be the regular "hold" of the vessel (see sketch, p. 8a), and there is a sense that access to this area is from above. The people involved do not intend any serious attempt to hide or secrete the material; they have the attitude that if they are stopped, the stuff will be found no matter what, so why bother. Material is, however, stowed in "lots" of up to perhaps a few hundred pounds interspersed with other objects and cargo. These other articles seem to be crates, boxes, etc., though there is one tarp-covered object that has rounded areas, is smooth, shiny, metallic, with glass portions, suggestive of an automobile. The hold area is not completely full--the whole floor area seems more or less covered, but the cargo extends only about half-way up the sides.
