Why do Millennials matter?

They have a major voice in politics and policy.

Percentage of Millennials in the national electorate:

 Benenson Strategy Group projection of likely voters*

Their social values and life experience suggest they support equality.

They're the most diverse generation ever.

They come from diverse family structures.

They are attaining high education levels.

They support social values and causes.

But many don't perceive a problem with gender equality in the U.S.

 CBS News Poll*

It's no surprise: Gender equality gets a small share of attention in national social media conversation.

Our content analysis of social media conversation found that gender equality got less attention in 2012 than many other issues (even marijuana legalization).

Politicians and pundits are driving the debate about women.

Six of the top 10 most visible messengers on women's issues in 2012 were male politicians and pundits, as determined by our news media content analysis.

The political debate does not reflect the concerns of many women.

Political debate on gender issues, as reflected in news coverage and commentary, focused almost entirely on reproductive rights and pay equity (left). Grassroots conversation, as reflected in social media, covered a much wider range of issues (right).
