According to the Protocol to New START, a deployed heavy bomber is one that is equipped for nuclear armaments but is not a "test heavy bomber or a heavy bomber located at a repair facility or at a production facility." Moreover, a heavy bomber is equipped for nuclear armaments if it is "equipped for long-range nuclear ALCMs, nuclear air-to-surface missiles, or nuclear bombs." All deployed heavy bombers must be located at air bases, which are defined as facilities "at which deployed heavy bombers are based and their operation is supported." If an air base cannot support the operations of heavy bombers, then the treaty does not consider it to be available for the basing of heavy bombers, even though they may land at such bases under some circumstances. Test heavy bombers can be based only at heavy bomber flight test centers and nondeployed heavy bombers other than test heavy bombers can be located only at repair facilities or production facilities for heavy bombers. Each party may have no more than 10 test heavy bombers.

Heavy bombers that are not equipped for long range nuclear ALCMs, nuclear air-to-surface missiles, or nuclear bombs will not count under the treaty limits. However, the treaty does specify that, "within the same type, a heavy bomber equipped for nuclear armaments shall be distinguishable from a heavy bomber equipped for non-nuclear armaments." Moreover, if a party does convert some bombers within a given type so that they are no longer equipped to carry nuclear weapons, it cannot base the nuclear and nonnuclear bombers at the same air base, unless otherwise agreed by the parties.

Hence, the United States could reduce the number of bombers that count under the treaty limits by altering some of its B-52 bombers so that they no longer carry nuclear weapons and by basing them at a separate base from those that still carry nuclear weapons. In addition, if the United States converted all of the bombers of a given type, so that none of them could carry nuclear armaments, then none of the bombers of that type would count under the New START treaty. This provision allows the United States to remove its B-1 bombers from treaty accountability. They no longer carry nuclear weapons, but they still counted under the old START Treaty and were never altered so that they could not carry nuclear weapons. The conversion rules that would affect the B-1 bombers are described below.

Limits on Warheads

Table 1 summarizes the warheads limits in START, the Moscow Treaty, and the New START Treaty. Two factors stand out in this comparison. First, the original START Treaty contained several sublimits on warheads attributed to different types of strategic weapons, in part because the United States wanted the treaty to impose specific limits on elements of the Soviet force that were deemed to be "destabilizing." Therefore, START sought to limit the Soviet force of heavy ICBMs by cutting in half the number of warheads deployed on these missiles, and to limit future Soviet deployments of mobile ICBMs. The Moscow Treaty and New START, in contrast, contain only a single limit on the aggregate number of deployed warheads. They provide each nation with the freedom to mix their forces as they see fit. This change reflects, in part, a lesser concern with Cold War models of strategic and crisis stability. It also derives from the U.S. desire to maintain flexibility in determining the structure of its own nuclear forces.

[53] Each individual missile will be identified in the database by a "unique identifier," which will, in most cases, be the serial number affixed to the missile during production.

Table 1 also highlights how the planned numbers of warheads in the U.S. and Russian strategic forces have declined in the years since the end of the Cold War. Before START entered into force in 1991, each side had more than 10,000 warheads on its strategic offensive delivery vehicles. If the parties implement the New START Treaty, that number will have declined by more than 80%. However, although all three treaties limit warheads, each uses different definitions and counting rules to determine how many warheads each side has deployed on its strategic forces.

Under START, the United States and Russia did not actually count deployed warheads. Instead, each party counted the launchers—ICBM silos, SLBM launch tubes, and heavy bombers—deployed by the other side. Under the terms of the treaty, they then assumed that each operational launcher contained an operational missile, and each operational missile carried an "attributed" number of warheads. The number of warheads attributed to each missile or bomber was the same for all missiles and bombers of that type. It did not recognize different loadings on individual delivery vehicles. This number was listed in an agreed database that the parties maintained during the life of the treaty. The parties then multiplied these warhead numbers by the number of deployed ballistic missiles and heavy bombers to determine the number of warheads that counted under the treaty's limits.

In most cases, the number of warheads attributed to each type of ICBM and SLBM was equal to the maximum number that missile had been tested with. START did, however, permit the parties to reduce the number of warheads attributed to some of their ballistic missiles through a process known as "downloading." When downloading missiles, a nation could remove a specified number of reentry vehicles from all the ICBMs at an ICBM base or from all the SLBMs in submarines at bases adjacent to a specified ocean.[54] They could then reduce the number of warheads attributed to those missiles in the database, and therefore, the number that counted under the treaty limits.

Unlike ballistic missiles, bombers counted as far fewer than the number of warheads they could carry. Bombers that were not equipped to carry long-range nuclear-armed cruise missiles counted as one warhead, even though they could carry 16 or more bombs and short-range missiles. U.S. bombers that were equipped to carry long-range nuclear-armed cruise missiles counted as 10 warheads, even though they could carry up to 20 cruise missiles. Soviet bombers that were equipped to carry long-range nuclear-armed cruise missiles counted as 8 warheads, even though they could carry up to 16 cruise missiles. These numbers were then multiplied by the numbers of deployed heavy bombers in each category to determine the number of warheads that would count under the treaty limits.

In contrast with START, the Moscow Treaty did not contain any definitions or counting rules to calculate the number of warheads that counted under the treaty limit. Its text indicated that it limited deployed strategic warheads, but the United States and Russia could each determine its own definition of this term. The United States counted "operationally deployed" strategic nuclear warheads and included both warheads on deployed ballistic missiles and bomber weapons stored near deployed bombers at their bases. Russia, in contrast, did not count any bomber weapons under its total, as these weapons were not actually deployed on any bombers. Moreover, because the Moscow Treaty did not contain any sublimits on warheads deployed on different categories of delivery vehicles, the two parties only had to calculate an aggregate total for their deployed warheads. In addition, while they exchanged data under START on the numbers of accountable launchers and warheads every six months, they only had to report the number of warheads they counted under the Moscow Treaty once, on December 31, 2012, at the end of the treaty's implementation period.

[54] A reentry vehicle is a cone-shaped container that holds a warhead to protect it from heat and other stresses when it reenters the Earth's atmosphere.

Like START, the New START Treaty contains definitions and counting rules that will help the parties calculate the number of warheads that count under the treaty limits. For ballistic missiles, these rules follow the precedent set in the Moscow Treaty and count only the actual number of warheads on deployed delivery vehicles. For bombers, however, these rules follow the precedent set in START and attribute a fixed number of warheads to each heavy bomber.

Article III of the New START Treaty states that "for ICBMs and SLBMs, the number of warheads shall be the number of reentry vehicles emplaced on deployed ICBMs and on deployed SLBMs." Missiles will not count as if they carried the maximum number of warheads tested on that type of missile. Each missile will have its own warhead number and that number can change during the life of the treaty. The parties will not, however, visit each missile to count and calculate the total number of warheads in the force. The New START database will list total number of warheads deployed on all deployed launchers. The parties will then have the opportunity, 10 times each year, to inspect one missile or three bombers selected at random. At the start of these inspections, before the inspecting party chooses a missile or bomber to view, the inspected party will provide a list of the number of warheads on each missile or bomber at the inspected base. The inspecting party will then choose a missile at random, and confirm that the number listed in the database is accurate. This is designed to deter the deployment of extra warheads by creating the possibility that a missile with extra warheads might be chosen for an inspection.

As was the case under START, this inspection process does not provide the parties with the means to visually inspect and count all the deployed warheads carried on deployed missiles. Under START, this number was calculated by counting launchers and multiplying by an attributed number of warheads. Under New START, as was the case in the Moscow Treaty, each side simply declares its number of total deployed warheads and includes that number in the treaty database. Unlike the Moscow Treaty, however, the parties will provide and update these numbers every six months during the life of the treaty, rather than just once at the end of the treaty.

Under the New START Treaty, each deployed heavy bomber equipped with nuclear armaments counts as one nuclear warhead. This is true whether the bomber is equipped to carry cruise missiles or gravity bombs. Neither the United States nor Russia deploys nuclear weapons on their bombers on a day-to-day basis. Because the treaty is supposed to count, and reduce, actual warheads carried by deployed delivery vehicles, the bomber weapons that are not deployed on a day-to-day basis are excluded. In addition, because the parties will use on-site inspections to confirm the actual number of deployed warheads on deployed delivery vehicles, and the bombers will have no warheads on them during inspections, the parties needed to come up with an arbitrary number to assign to the bombers. That number is one.

Conversion and Elimination

According to New START, ICBM launchers, SLBM launchers, and heavy bombers equipped to carry nuclear armaments shall continue to count under the treaty limits until they are converted or eliminated according to the provisions described in the treaty's Protocol. These provisions are far less demanding than those in the original START Treaty and will provide the United States and Russia with far more flexibility in determining how to reduce their forces to meet the treaty limits.

ICBM Launchers

Under START, ICBM launchers were "destroyed by excavation to a depth of no less than eight meters, or by explosion to a depth of no less than six meters." If missiles were removed from silos, and the silos were not eliminated in this fashion, then the silos still counted as if they held a deployed missile and as if the deployed missile carried the attributed number of warheads.

New START lists three ways in which the parties may eliminate ICBM silo launchers. It states that silo launchers "shall be destroyed by excavating them to a depth of no less than eight meters or by explosion to a depth of no less than six meters." It also indicates that the silos can be "completely filled with debris resulting from demolition of infrastructure, and with earth or gravel." Finally, it indicates the party carrying out the elimination can develop other procedures to eliminate its silos. It may have to demonstrate this elimination alternative to the other party, but that party cannot dispute or deny the use of that method.

Hence, instead of blowing up the silos or digging them out of the ground, the parties to the treaty might choose to disable the silo using measures it identifies itself, so that it can no longer launch a missile. This could be far less costly and destructive than the procedures mandated under START, and would help both nations eliminate some silos that have stood empty for years while continuing to count under the old START Treaty. For the United States, this would include the 50 silos that held Peacekeeper missiles until 2005 and the 50 silos that held Minuteman III missiles until 2008. The United States has never destroyed these silos, so they continued to count under START. It can now disable theses silos and remove them from its tally of launchers under the New START Treaty. According to the recent reports, the Air Force Global Strike Command began preparations to eliminate these silos in March 2011, and plans to fill them with gravel. It expects to complete this process by 2017.

Mobile ICBM launchers

Under START, the elimination process for launchers for road-mobile ICBMs required that "the erector-launcher mechanism and leveling supports shall be removed from the launcher chassis" and that "the framework of the erector-launcher mechanism on which the ICBM is mounted and erected shall be cut at locations that are not assembly joints into two pieces of approximately equal size." It also required that the missile launch support equipment be removed from the launcher chassis, and that the "mountings of the erector-launcher mechanism and of the launcher leveling supports shall be cut off the launcher chassis" and cut into two pieces of approximately equal size. START also required that 0.78 meters of the launcher chassis be cut off and cut into two parts, so that the chassis would be too short to support mobile ICBMs.

Under New START, the elimination process for launchers for road mobile ICBMs is far more simple and far less destructive. As was the case under START, the elimination "shall be carried out by cutting the erector-launcher mechanism, leveling supports, and mountings of the erector-launcher mechanism from the launcher chassis and by removing the missile launch support equipment ... from the launcher chassis." But neither the framework nor the chassis itself have to be cut into pieces. If the chassis is going to be used "at a declared facility for purposes not inconsistent with the Treaty" the surfaces of the vehicle that will be visible to national technical means of verification must be painted a different color or pattern than those surfaces on a deployed mobile ICBM launcher.

SLBM Launchers

Under START, the SLBM launch tubes were considered to be eliminated when the entire missile section was removed from the submarine; or when "the missile launch tubes, and all elements of their reinforcement, including hull liners and segments of circular structural members between the missile launch tubes, as well as the entire portion of the pressure hull, the entire portion of the outer hull, and the entire portion of the superstructure through which all the missile launch tubes pass and that contain all the missile launch-tube penetrations" were removed from the submarine. The missile launch tubes then had to "be cut into two pieces of approximately equal size."

Under New START, SLBM launch tubes can be eliminated "by removing all missile launch tube hatches, their associated superstructure fairings, and, if applicable, gas generators." In other words, the missile section of the submarine and the individual launch tubes can remain in place in the submarine, and cease to count under the treaty limits, if they are altered so that they can no longer launch ballistic missiles. Moreover, according to the Ninth Agreed Statement in the New START Protocol, SLBM launch tubes that have been converted in accordance with this procedure and are "incapable of launching SLBMs may simultaneously be located on a ballistic missile submarine" with launch tubes that are still capable of launching SLBMs. After a party completes this type of conversion, it "shall conduct a one-time exhibition of a converted launcher and an SLBM launcher that has not been converted" to demonstrate, to the other party, "the distinguishing features of a converted launcher and an SLBM launcher that has not been converted." The United States plans to use this procedure to reduce the number of launch tubes on each SSBN from 24 to 20. According to recent reports, it will begin this process in 2015, so that it will have no more than 240 operational launchers for SLBMs by the treaty deadline of February 2018.[55]

Under START, the United States had to essentially destroy an entire submarine to remove its launch tubes from accountability under the treaty limits. With these provisions in New START, the United States cannot only convert ballistic missile submarines to other uses without destroying their missile tubes and missile compartments; it can also reduce the number of accountable deployed SLBM launchers on ballistic missile submarines that continue to carry nuclear-armed SLBMs. These provisions will provide the United States a great deal of flexibility when it determines the structure of its nuclear forces under New START.

During the past decade, the United States converted four of its Trident ballistic missile submarines so that they no longer carry ballistic missiles but now carry conventional cruise missiles and other types of weapons. These are now known as SSGNs. Because the United States did not remove the missile compartment from these submarines, they continued to count as if they carried 24 Trident missiles, with 8 warheads per missile, under the old START Treaty. These submarines will not count under the New START Treaty.

In the Second Agreed Statement in the New START Protocol, the United States has agreed that, "no later than three years after entry into force of the Treaty, the United States of America shall conduct an initial one-time exhibition of each of these four SSGNs. The purpose of such exhibitions shall be to confirm that the launchers on such submarines are incapable of launching SLBMs." Moreover, if an SSGN is located at an SSBN base when a Russian inspection team visits that base, the inspection team will have the right to inspect the SSGN again to confirm that the launchers have not been converted back to carry SLBMs. Russia can conduct six of these re-inspections during the life of the treaty, but no more than two inspections of any one of the SSGNs.

Heavy Bombers

Under START, heavy bombers were eliminated by having the tail section cut off of the fuselage at a location that obviously was not an assembly joint; having the wings separated from the fuselage at any location by any method; and having the remainder of the fuselage cut into two pieces, with the cut occurring in the area where the wings were attached to the fuselage, but at a location obviously not an assembly joint.

START also allowed the parties to remove heavy bombers from treaty accountability by converting them to heavy bombers that were not equipped to carry nuclear armaments. According to the elimination and conversion Protocol in START, this could be done by modifying all weapons bays and by removing or modifying the external attachment joints for either long-range nuclear ALCMs or other nuclear armaments that the bombers were equipped to carry.

The elimination procedure for heavy bombers has also been simplified under New START. To eliminate bombers, the parties must cut "a wing or tail section from the fuselage at locations obviously not assembly joints," or cut "the fuselage into two parts at a location obviously not an assembly joint." It no longer has to remove the wings from the fuselage. In addition, to convert a bomber counted under the treaty to a heavy bomber no longer equipped to carry nuclear armaments, the parties can either modify the weapons bays and external attachments for pylons so that they cannot carry nuclear armaments, or modify all internal and external launcher assemblies so that they cannot carry nuclear armaments, or develop any other procedure to carry out the conversion. As was the case with the conversion and elimination of missile launchers, the party may have to demonstrate its conversion procedure, but the other party does not have the right to object or reject the procedure.

The United States no longer equips its B-1 bombers with nuclear weapons, and has no plans to do so in the future. It has not, however, converted these bombers to nonnuclear heavy bombers using the procedures outlined in START. As a result, they continued to count as one delivery vehicle and one warhead under the counting rules in START. The United States does not, however, want to count these bombers under the New START Treaty. As a result, in the First Agreed Statement, the United States and Russia agreed, during the first year that the treaty is in force, the United States will conduct a "one-time exhibition" to demonstrate to Russia that these bombers are no longer equipped to carry nuclear weapons. The bombers that no longer carry nuclear weapons will have a "distinguishing feature" that will be recorded in the treaty database and will be evident on all B-1 bombers that are no longer equipped to carry nuclear weapons. After all the B-1 bombers have been converted in this manner, they will no longer count against the limits in the New START Treaty.

Mobile ICBMs

Mobile ICBMs in START

Mobile ICBMs became an issue in the original START negotiations in the mid-1980s, as the Soviet Union began to deploy a single-warhead road-mobile ICBM, the SS-25, and a 10-warhead rail-mobile ICBM, the SS-24.[56] The United States initially proposed that START ban mobile ICBMs because the United States would not be able to locate or target these systems during a conflict. Some also questioned whether the United States would be able to monitor Soviet mobile ICBM deployments well enough to count the missiles and verify Soviet compliance with the limits in START. Some also argued that the Soviet Union might be able to stockpile hidden missiles and launchers, and to reload mobile ICBM launchers during a conflict because the United States could not target and destroy them.

[56] In 1987, the United States began to develop its own mobile ICBM, the 10-warhead MX (Peacekeeper) missile, and it continued to explore mobile basing for the new single-warhead small ICBM. Although it eventually deployed the Peacekeeper missile in fixed silos, the parties considered it to be a mobile ICBM under the terms of START.

The Soviet Union refused to ban mobile ICBMs. As a result, START limited the United States and Soviet Union to 1,100 warheads on mobile ICBMs. The treaty also limited the numbers of nondeployed missiles and nondeployed launchers for mobile ICBMs. Each side could retain 250 missiles and 110 launchers for mobile ICBMs, with no more than 125 missiles and 18 launchers for rail mobile ICBMs. This did not eliminate the risk of "breakout," which refers to the rapid addition of stored missiles to the deployed force, but it did limit the magnitude of the breakout potential and the number of missiles that the Soviet Union could "reload" on deployed launchers during a conflict.

START also contained a number of complementary, and sometimes overlapping, monitoring mechanisms that were designed to help the parties keep track of the numbers and locations of permitted missiles.[57] Each side could monitor the final assembly facility for the missiles to count them as they entered the force.[58] The parties also agreed to record the serial numbers, referred to in the treaty as "unique identifiers," for the mobile ICBMs, and to list these numbers in the treaty's database. These numbers were used to help track and identify permitted missiles because the parties could check the serial numbers during on-site inspections to confirm that the missiles they encountered were those that they expected to see at the facility during the inspection. The parties also had to provide notifications when mobile ICBMs moved between permitted facilities and when mobile ICBMs moved out of their main operating bases for an exercise. These notifications were designed to complicate efforts to move extra, hidden missiles into the deployed force. Finally, missiles and launchers removed from the force had to be eliminated according to specific procedures outlined in the treaty. This not only helped the parties keep an accurate count of the deployed missiles, but served as a further deterrent to efforts to hide extra missiles outside the treaty regime.

Mobile ICBMs in New START

The New START Treaty contains many limits and restrictions that will affect Russia's force of mobile ICBMs, but it does not single them out with many of the additional constraints that were contained in START. Russia pressed for an easing of the restrictions on mobile ICBMs in New START, in part because these restrictions were one sided and only affected Russian forces. But Russian officials also noted, and the United States agreed, that mobile ICBMs could enhance the survivability of Russia's nuclear forces, and therefore strengthen strategic stability under the new treaty.

The United States was also willing to relax the restrictions on mobile ICBMs because it is far less concerned about Russia's ability to break out of the treaty limits than it was in the 1980s. After 15 years of START implementation, the United States has far more confidence in its knowledge of the number of deployed and nondeployed Russian mobile ICBMs, as it kept count of these missiles as they entered and left the Russian force during START. There is also far less concern about Russia stockpiling extra missiles while New START is in force. During the 1980s, the Soviet Union produced dozens of new missiles each year; Russia now adds fewer than 10 missiles to its force each year.[59] Some estimates indicate that, with this level of production, [57] For more information on the monitoring regime in START, see CRS Report R41201, Monitoring and Verification in Arms Control, by Amy F. Woolf.

[58] The perimeter/portal continuous monitoring systems (PPCMS) consisted of fences surrounding the entire perimeter of the facility and one restricted portal through which all vehicles large enough to carry items limited by the treaty (such as the first stage of a mobile ICBM) had to pass. The portal contained scales and other measuring devices that the countries could use to determine whether the vehicle carried an item limited by the treaty.

[59] According to one U.S. inspector, monitoring at Votkinsk "was very monotonous. We could have months go by Russia will find it difficult to retain the 700 deployed missiles permitted by the treaty. In such a circumstance, it would have neither the need nor the ability to stockpile and hide extra missiles. Moreover, where the United States was once concerned about Russia's ability to reload its mobile launchers with spare missiles, after launching the first missiles during a conflict, this scenario no longer seems credible. It would mean that Russia maintained the ability to send extra missiles and the equipment needed to load them on launchers out on patrol with its deployed systems and that it could load these missiles quickly, in the field, in the midst of a nuclear war, with U.S. weapons falling all around. Yet, Russia has not practiced or exercised this capability and it is hard to imagine that it would try it, for the first time, in the midst of a nuclear war.

The New START Treaty does not contain a sublimit on mobile ICBMs or their warheads. It also does not contain any limits on the number of nondeployed mobile ICBMs or the number of nondeployed mobile ICBM launchers. These launchers and warheads will, however, count under the aggregate limits set by the treaty, including the limit of 800 deployed and nondeployed launchers. As a result, the United States will still need to count the number of mobile ICBMs in Russia's force.

New START will not permit perimeter and portal monitoring at missile assembly facilities. The parties must, however, provide notification at least 48 hours before the time when solid-fuel ICBMs and solid-fuel SLBMs leave the production facilities. Moreover, the parties will continue to list the serial numbers, or unique identifiers, for mobile ICBMs in the shared database.[60]

New START limits the locations of mobile ICBMs and their launchers, both to help the United States keep track of the missiles covered by the treaty and to deter Russian efforts to hide extra missiles away from the deployed force. Deployed mobile ICBMs and their launchers must be located only at ICBM bases. All nondeployed launchers for mobile ICBMs must be located at "production facilities, ICBM loading facilities, repair facilities, storage facilities, conversion or elimination facilities, training facilities, test ranges, and space launch facilities." The locations of nondeployed mobile ICBMs are also limited to loading facilities, maintenance facilities, repair facilities, storage facilities, conversion or elimination facilities test ranges, space launch facilities, and production facilities. Some of these facilities may be at bases for operational mobile ICBMs, but, in that case, the nondeployed missiles must remain in the designated facility and cannot be located in deployment areas.

Moreover, when deployed or nondeployed missiles or launchers move from one facility to another, the parties will have to update the database so each facility contains a complete list of each item located at that facility, and of the unique identifier associated with each item. Then, according to the Protocol to the Treaty, "inspectors shall have the right to read the unique identifiers on all designated deployed ICBMs or designated deployed SLBMs, non-deployed ICBMs, non-deployed SLBMs, and designated heavy bombers that are located at the inspection site."[61] Hence, the parties will have the opportunity to confirm that items located at the facilities are supposed to be there.

This is designed not only to increase transparency and understanding while the treaty is in force, but also to discourage efforts to hide extra missiles and break out of the treaty limits. The treaty does not limit the number of nondeployed missiles, but it does provide the United States with continuous information about their locations and the opportunity, during on-site inspections, to without inspecting a missile." See Elaine M. Grossman, "U.S. Treaty-Monitoring Presence at Russian Missile Plant Winding Down," Global Security Newswire, November 20, 2009.

[60] In START, the parties recorded unique identifiers only for mobile ICBMs. In New START, the parties will record these numbers for all ICBMs, SLBMs, and heavy bombers covered by the limits in Treaty.

confirm that these missiles are not mixed into the deployed force. Moreover, the number of nondeployed launchers for these missiles is limited, under the 800 limit on deployed and nondeployed launchers. So, even if Russia did accumulate a stock of nondeployed missiles, the number that it could add to its force in a relatively short amount of time would be limited.

Some have questioned whether Russia might use these stored mobile ICBMs to break out of the treaty by deploying them on mobile launchers that are not limited by the treaty. Specifically, they have questioned whether the New START Treaty would count rail-mobile ICBMs, and, if not, whether Russia could develop and deploy enough of these launchers to gain a military advantage over the United States.[62] This concern derives from the definition of mobile launcher in the paragraph 45 of the Protocol to the Treaty, which indicates that a mobile launcher is "an erector-launcher mechanism for launching ICBMs and the self-propelled device on which it is mounted [emphasis added]." This definition clearly captures road-mobile launchers, such as those that Russia uses for its SS-25 and SS-27 missiles, because the transporters for these missiles are self-propelled. But a rail car that carried an erector-launcher for an ICBM would not be self-propelled; it would be propelled by the train's locomotive.

Others, however, point to several provisions in the treaty that indicate that rail-mobile launchers of ICBMs would count under the treaty limits. First, they note that the treaty limits all deployed and nondeployed ICBM launchers. It defines ICBM launcher, in paragraph 28 of the Protocol to the Treaty, as "a device intended or used to contain, prepare for launch, and launch an ICBM." Any erector-launcher for ICBMs would be covered by this definition, regardless of whether it was deployed on a fixed site, on a road-mobile transporter, or on a railcar.

Moreover, the article-by-article analysis of the treaty specifically states that "all of the defined terms are used in at least one place elsewhere in the Treaty documents." Article III, paragraph 8 of the treaty lists the current types of weapons deployed by each side and notes that these all count against the limits. It does not list any missiles deployed on rail-mobile launchers, and, therefore, the Protocol does not define rail-mobile launchers, because Russia no longer deploys any missiles on rail-mobile launchers. It had deployed SS-24 missiles on such launchers during the 1980s and 1990s, but these were all retired in the past decade, and the last operating base for these missiles and railcars was closed in 2007.[63]

The treaty would not prohibit Russia from deploying these types of systems again in the future. Article V specifically states that "modernization and replacement of strategic offensive arms may be carried out." However, the second paragraph of this article indicates that, "when a party believes a new kind of strategic offensive arms is emerging, that party shall have the right to raise the question of such a strategic offensive arm for consideration in the Bilateral Consultative Commission." Section 6 of the Protocol to the Treaty, which describes the Bilateral Consultative Commission, states that this body should "resolve questions related to the applicability of provisions of the treaty to a new kind of strategic offensive arm." In addition, Article XV of the treaty states that "if it becomes necessary to make changes in the Protocol ... that do not affect the substantive rights or obligations under this Treaty," the parties can use the BCC to reach agreement on these changes without amending the treaty. Hence, if Russia were to deploy ICBMs on rail-mobile launchers, the parties could modify the definition to "mobile launcher" to confirm that these weapons count under the treaty limits.

[62] See, for example, Christopher Ford, "Does New START Fumble Reloads and Rail-Mobile ICBMs?" New Paradigms Forum, April 26, 2010, http://02e18f7.netsolhost.com/New_Paradigms_Forum/Nuclear_Weapons/Entries/2010/4/26_New_START_Fumbles_Missile_REloads_and_Rail-Mobile_ICBMs.html.

New START does not define rail-mobile launchers for ICBMs because neither the United States nor Russia currently deploys these systems and the treaty does not specifically prohibit their deployment in the future. If, however, either party installs an erector-launcher for an ICBM on a rail car, that launcher would count under the treaty limits, and the new type of strategic arm, represented by the launcher on a railcar, would be covered by the limits in the treaty. The parties would then use the BCC to determine which of the monitoring provisions and elimination and conversion rules applied to that type of weapons system.

Monitoring and Verification[64]

The original START Treaty included a comprehensive and overlapping set of provisions that was designed to allow the United States and Soviet Union to collect a wide range of data on their forces and activities and to determine whether the forces and activities were consistent with the limits in the treaty. While each party would collect most of this information with its own satellites and remote sensing equipment—known as national technical means of verification (NTM)—the treaty also called for the extensive exchange of data detailing the numbers and locations of affected weapons, numerous types of on-site inspections, notifications, exhibitions, and continuous monitoring at assembly facilities for mobile ICBMs. Further, in START, the parties agreed that they would not encrypt or otherwise deny access to the telemetry generated during missile flight tests, so that the other side could record these data and use them in evaluating the capabilities of missile systems.

The New START Treaty contains a monitoring and verification regime that resembles the regime in START, in that its text contains detailed definitions of items limited by the treaty, provisions governing the use of NTM to gather data on each side's forces and activities, an extensive database that identifies the numbers, types, and locations of items limited by the treaty, provisions requiring notifications about items limited by the treaty, and inspections allowing the parties to confirm information shared during data exchanges. At the same time, the verification regime has been streamlined to make it less costly and complex than the regime in START. It also has been adjusted to reflect the limits in New START and the current circumstances in the relationship between the United States and Russia. In particular, it focuses on maintaining transparency, cooperation, and openness, as well as on deterring and detecting potential violations.

Under New START, the United States and Russia continue to rely on their NTM to collect information about the numbers and locations of their strategic forces. They may also broadcast and exchange telemetry—the data generated during missile flight tests—up to five times each year, although, in practice, they have done so only once each year. They do not need these data to monitor compliance with any particular limits in New START, but the telemetry exchange provides some transparency into the capabilities of their systems.[65] The parties also exchange a vast amount of data about their forces, specifying not only their distinguishing characteristics, but also their precise locations. They will notify each other, and update the database, whenever they move forces between declared facilities. The treaty also requires the parties to display their forces, and allows each side to participate in exhibitions, to confirm information listed in the database.

New START permits the parties to conduct up to 18 short-notice on-site inspections each year. These inspections began in early April 2011, 60 days after the treaty entered into force. These inspections can occur at facilities that house both deployed and nondeployed launchers and missiles. The treaty divides these into Type One inspections and Type Two inspections. Each side can conduct up to 10 Type One inspections and up to 8 Type Two inspections. Moreover, during each Type One inspection, the parties will be able to perform two different types of inspection activities—these are essentially equivalent to the data update inspections and reentry vehicle inspections in the original START Treaty. As a result, the 18 short-notice inspections permitted under New START are essentially equivalent to the 28 short-notice inspections permitted under START.

Type One Inspections

Type One inspections are those that occur at ICBM bases, submarine bases, and air bases that house deployed or nondeployed launchers, missiles, and bombers. The parties use these inspections "to confirm the accuracy of declared data on the numbers and types of deployed and non-deployed strategic offensive arms subject to this treaty. During Type One inspections, the parties may also confirm that the number of warheads located on deployed ICBMs and deployed SLBMs and the number of nuclear armaments located on deployed heavy bombers" are consistent with the numbers declared deployed on those specific launchers.

The inspections used to confirm the number of deployed warheads in New START will be distinctly different from the inspections in START because the counting rules for ballistic missiles have changed. Under START, the treaty database listed the number of warheads attributed to a type of missile, and each missile of that type counted as the same number of warheads. The parties then inspected the missiles to confirm that the number of warheads on a particular missile did not exceed the number attributed to that type of missile. The database in New START will list the aggregate number of warheads deployed on all the missiles at a given base, but before beginning a Type One inspection, the team will receive a briefing on the actual number of warheads deployed on each missile at the base. During the inspections, the parties will have the right to designate one ICBM or one SLBM for inspection, and, when inspecting that missile, the parties will be able to count the actual number of reentry vehicles deployed on the missile to confirm that it equals the number provided for that particular missile prior to the inspection. The inspected party can cover the reentry vehicles to protect information not related to the number of warheads, but the party must use covers that allow the inspectors to identify the actual number of warheads on the missile.

Because these inspections are random, and occur on short notice, they provide the parties with a chance to detect an effort by the other party to deploy a missile with more than its listed number of warheads. As a result, the inspections may deter efforts to conceal extra warheads on the deployed force. These inspections, by allowing the parties to count the actual number of deployed warheads, provide added transparency.

Type Two Inspections

Type Two inspections occur at facilities that house nondeployed or converted launchers and missiles. These include "ICBM loading facilities; SLBM loading facilities; storage facilities for ICBMs, SLBMs, and mobile launchers of ICBMs; repair facilities for ICBMs, SLBMs, and mobile launchers of ICBMs; test ranges; and training facilities." The parties will perform these inspections "to confirm the accuracy of declared technical characteristics and declared data, specified for such facilities, on the number and types of non-deployed ICBMs and non-deployed SLBMs, first stages of ICBMs and SLBMs, and nondeployed launchers of ICBMs." In addition, they can conduct these inspections at formerly declared facilities, "to confirm that such facilities are not being used for purposes inconsistent with this Treaty." They can also use Type II inspections to confirm that solid-fueled ICBMs, solid-fueled SLBMs, or mobile launchers of ICBMs have been eliminated according to treaty procedures.

Ballistic Missile Defense

Presidents Obama and Medvedev had agreed, when they met in April 2009, that the two nations would address Russia's concerns with U.S. missile defense programs in a separate forum from the negotiations on a New START Treaty.[66] However, during their meeting in Moscow in July 2010, Presidents Obama and Medvedev agreed that the treaty would contain a "provision on the interrelationship of strategic offensive arms and strategic defensive arms."[67] This statement, which appears in the preamble to New START, states that the parties recognize "the existence of the interrelationship between strategic offensive arms and strategic defensive arms, that this interrelationship will become more important as strategic nuclear arms are reduced, and that current strategic defensive arms do not undermine the viability and effectiveness of the strategic offensive arms of the parties."

Russia and the United States each issued unilateral statements when they signed New START that clarified their positions on the relationship between New START and missile defenses. Russia stated that > the Treaty can operate and be viable only if the United States of America refrains from developing its missile defense capabilities quantitatively or qualitatively. Consequently, the exceptional circumstances referred to in Article 14 of the Treaty include increasing the capabilities of the United States of America's missile defense system in such a way that threatens the potential of the strategic nuclear forces of the Russian Federation.[68]

In its statement, the United States stated that its > missile defense systems are not intended to affect the strategic balance with Russia. The United States missile defense systems would be employed to defend the United States against limited missile launches, and to defend its deployed forces, allies and partners against regional threats. The United States intends to continue improving and deploying its missile defense systems in order to defend itself against limited attack and as part of our collaborative approach to strengthening stability in key regions.[69]

These statements do not impose any obligations on either the United States or Russia. As Senator Lugar indicated before New START was signed, these statements are, "in essence editorial opinions." Under Secretary of State Ellen Tauscher also stated that "Russia's unilateral statement on missile defenses is not an integral part of the New START Treaty. It's not legally-binding. It won't constrain U.S. missile defense programs."[70] These statements also do not provide Russia with "veto power" over U.S. missile defense systems. Although Russia has said it may withdraw from the treaty if the U.S. missile defenses threaten "the potential of the strategic nuclear forces of the Russian Federation," the United States has no obligation to consult with Russia to confirm that its planned defenses do not cross this threshold. It may develop and deploy whatever defenses it chooses; Russia can then determine, for itself, whether those defenses affect its strategic nuclear forces and whether it thinks the threat to those forces justifies withdrawal from the treaty.

Article V, paragraph 3 of New START also mentions ballistic missile defense interceptors. It states that the parties cannot convert ICBM launchers and SLBM launchers to launchers for missile defense interceptors and that they cannot convert launchers of missile defense interceptors to launchers for ICBMs and SLBMs. At the same time, the treaty makes it clear that the five ICBM silos at Vandenberg Air Force Base that have already been converted to carry missile defense interceptors are not affected by this prohibition. It states that "this provision shall not apply to ICBM launchers that were converted prior to signature of this Treaty for placement of missile defense interceptors therein."

This provision is designed to address Russian concerns about the U.S. ability to "break out" of the treaty by placing ICBMs in silos that had held missile defense interceptors or by converting ICBM silos to missile interceptor silos then quickly reversing that conversion to add offensive missiles to its forces with little warning. Russia began to express this concern after the United States converted the five ICBM silos at Vandenberg for missile defense interceptors. It initially sought to reverse this conversion, or at least to count the silos under the New START limits. The United States refused, but, in exchange for Russia accepting that the five converted silos would not count under New START, the United States agreed that it would not convert additional silos.

The provision will also protect U.S. missile defense interceptors from the START inspection regime. If the parties were permitted to convert missile defense silos to ICBM silos, they would also have been able to visit and inspect those silos to confirm that they did not hold missiles limited by the treaty. The ban on such conversions means that this type of inspection is not only unnecessary, but also not permitted.

The Obama Administration has stated on many occasions that the New START Treaty does not contain any provisions that limit the numbers or capabilities of current or planned U.S. ballistic missile defense systems.[71] The ban on launcher conversion does not alter this conclusion because the United States has no plans to use any additional ICBM launchers or any SLBM launchers to hold missile defense interceptors. It is constructing new launchers for its missile defense systems. Some have questioned, however, whether the ban on silo conversion may limit missile defenses in the future, particularly if the United States wanted to respond to an emerging missile threat by quickly expanding its numbers of missile defense interceptors.[72]

General Jim Jones, President Obama's National Security Adviser during the negotiations, stated that this provision is a "limit in theory, but not in reality."[73] It is not just that the United States has no plans to convert ICBM silos to missile defense interceptor silos, it is that it would be quicker and less expensive for the United States to build new silos for missile defense interceptors than to remove the ICBMs and all their equipment, reconfigure the silo, and install all the equipment for the missile defense interceptors. Moreover, given that the missile defense interceptor launched from the central United States, where U.S. ICBM silos are located, would drop debris on U.S. territory, the United States might prefer to locate its missile defense interceptors in new launchers near the U.S. coast.

General Patrick O'Reilly, then the Director of the Missile Defense Agency, also stated that his agency "never had a plan to convert additional ICBM silos at Vandenberg and intends to hedge against increased BMDS [ballistic missile defense system] requirements by completing construction of Missile Field 2 at Fort Greely. Moreover, we determined that if more interceptors were to be added at Vandenberg AFB, it would be less expensive to build a new GBI [ground-based interceptor] missile field (which is not prohibited by the treaty)."[74] He went on to note that "some time ago we examined the concept of launching missile defense interceptors from submarines and found it an unattractive and extremely expensive option." Putting missile defense interceptors in SLBM launchers would undermine the primary mission of the submarine, which is designed to patrol deeply and quietly to remain invulnerable to attack, by requiring it to remain in one place near the surface while it sought to track and engage attacking missiles.

Conventional Long-Range Strike

During their summit meeting in July 2009, Presidents Obama and Medvedev agreed that the New START Treaty would contain "a provision on the impact of intercontinental ballistic missiles and submarine-launched ballistic missiles in a non-nuclear configuration on strategic stability." This statement, which is in the preamble to the treaty, simply states that the parties are "mindful of the impact of conventionally armed ICBMs and SLBMs on strategic stability."

During the negotiations on New START, Russia voiced concerns about U.S. plans to deploy conventional warheads on ballistic missiles that now carry nuclear warheads.[75] Russian officials have argued that these weapons could upset stability for several reasons. First, even if Russia were not the target of an attack with these missiles, it might not know whether the missile carried a nuclear warhead or a conventional warhead, or whether it was headed toward a target in Russia. Moreover, ballistic missiles armed with conventional warheads could destroy significant targets in Russia and, therefore, they might provide the United States with the ability to attack such targets, with little warning, without resorting to nuclear weapons. Finally, some argued that the United States might replace the conventional warheads with nuclear warheads to exceed the limits in a treaty.

Russia initially sought to include a provision in New START that would ban the deployment of conventional warheads on strategic ballistic missiles. The United States rejected this proposal. It was considering this capability as a way to attack targets around the world promptly, and did not envision using these weapons against Russia. As a result, as the White House noted in its Fact Sheet on New START, "the Treaty does not contain any constraints on ... current or planned United States long-range conventional strike capabilities."[76] However, if the United States deployed conventional warheads on missiles that are covered by the limits in START, the warheads on these missiles would count under the treaty limit on deployed warheads. Because the United States expected to deploy very small numbers of these systems, this trade-off would not have a significant effect on U.S. nuclear capabilities.[77]

Moreover, if the United States deployed conventional warheads on new types of long-range strike systems, these systems would not necessarily count under or be affected by the limits in New START. The United States would likely consider these to be a "new type of strategic offensive arms." Under Article V, paragraph 2, Russia would have the right to raise its concerns about these weapons within the Bilateral Consultative Commission (BCC), but the United States would not have to accept Russia's interpretation or accede to any requests to count the systems under the treaty.[78] The same procedures would apply if Russia were to develop new types of strategic offensive arms—with either nuclear or conventional warheads. The United States could raise its concerns with these weapons in the BCC, but Russia would not have to accept a U.S. request to count these weapons under the treaty.

U.S. and Russian Forces Under New START

U.S. Forces

According to the 2010 Nuclear Posture Review (NPR), which was released by DOD on April 6, 2010,[79] the United States planned to maintain a triad of ICBMs, SLBMs, and heavy bombers under New START.[80] The 2010 NPR did not specify how many ICBMs would remain in the force, but indicated that each would be deployed with only one warhead. It also indicated that the United States would, initially at least, retain 14 Trident submarines. It might, however, reduce its fleet to 12 submarines after 2015. The NPR did not indicate whether the Trident submarines would continue to be deployed with 24 missiles on each submarine, or if the Navy would eliminate some of the launchers on operational submarines in accordance with the treaty's Ninth Agreed Statement. Finally, the NPR indicated that the United States would convert some of its 76 dual-capable B-52 bombers to a conventional-only role.

The Obama Administration clarified its plans for U.S. forces under New START in the 1251 plan that it submitted to the Senate with the treaty documents on May 13, 2010.[81] This plan indicated that the United States would eliminate at least 30 deployed ICBMs, retaining a force of up to 420 deployed launchers under the treaty limits. It would also retain 14 Trident submarines, but each submarine would contain only 20 launchers, and two of the submarines would be in overhaul at any time, so only 240 launchers would count under the limit on deployed launchers. In addition, the report indicated that the United States would retain up to 60 deployed bombers equipped for nuclear weapons, including all 18 B-2 bombers in the current force.

[81] Congress mandated that the President submit a report on this plan in Section 1251 of the FY2010 Defense Authorization Act, P.L. 111-84.

This force would have included up to 720 deployed ICBMs, SLBMs, and heavy bombers, a number that exceeds the 700 deployed missiles and bombers permitted by the treaty. In a hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee on June 17, 2010, Secretary of Defense Gates and Admiral Mullen, then Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged that the United States would have to make a small number of further reductions, or convert a small number of additional systems to nondeployed status, to meet the treaty limits. However, they noted that because the United States would have seven years to reduce its forces to these limits, they saw no reason to identify a final force structure at that point. Secretary Gates noted that DOD was considering a number of options for the final force structure, and would make a decision on this force structure after considering the international security environment and Russia's force structure in the treaty's later years.

The Obama Pentagon released its plans for the New START force structure in April 8, 2014. As was indicated in May 2010, this force will include 14 submarines with 20 launchers on each submarine. Because two submarines will be in overhaul at any time, these submarines will count as carrying 240 deployed launchers within a total of 280 deployed and nondeployed launchers. The force also calls for a reduction in the number of deployed ICBMs from 450 to 400, with the retention of all 50 empty launchers, for a total force of 450 deployed and nondeployed ICBM launchers. The Air Force will also count 4 ICBM test launchers as nondeployed launchers within the total. Finally, New START force will include 60 deployed bombers and 6 nondeployed bombers.

Even before it determined the final force structure, the Pentagon had requested funding to pursue activities that would enable these reductions, regardless of the specific force structure decisions. For example, in the FY2014 budget, the Pentagon requested funding for an environmental assessment (EA) that would be needed before it could eliminate ICBM silos. Several Members of Congress objected to this study, arguing that it would allow the Administration to eliminate an ICBM squadron regardless of whether this turned out to be the preferred option for force reductions. Several Members strongly supported the retention of all 450 ICBM silos, even if a portion of them were nondeployed, with the missiles removed to meet the New START limit of 700 deployed launchers.[82]

The Pentagon responded to this criticism by noting that the EA would not predetermine the outcome of the force structure decision. However, if it were not initiated by the end of 2013, it would not be completed in time to support reductions by 2018, if the Pentagon chose to pursue those reductions. In other words, even if the study were completed, the ICBM silos could remain in the force, but if the study was not begun in time, the ICBM silos could not be eliminated, even if that proved to be the preferred force structure option. In response to these concerns, Congress included a provision in the National Defense Authorization Act for 2014 (H.R. 3304, §1056) that limited the Pentagon's ability to reduce U.S. forces under New START. Specifically, the legislation states that "the Secretary of Defense may only use funds authorized to be appropriated by this Act or otherwise made available for fiscal year 2014 to carry out activities to prepare for such reductions." Further, the legislation states that only 50% of the funds authorized for the EA can be obligated or expended until the Secretary of Defense submits the required plan that describes preferred force structure option under New START. The Pentagon has now submitted the plan, but it is unclear whether the EA will proceed.

Table 2, below, contains an estimated force structure of the United States prior to New START's entry into force; the force structure as of February 5, 2018 (when the reductions were required to meet the treaty limits); and the New START force outlined by the Administration in April 2014. As these data demonstrate, the United States reached the reduced force level required by the treaty. Within these limits, the United States retains a triad of ICBMs, SLBMs, and heavy bombers. It has reduced the number of deployed nuclear-armed B-52 bombers by converting many to conventional missions. It has reduced the number of launchers on its Trident submarines and retains 400 Minuteman III missiles. An additional 54 Minuteman III launchers do not hold ICBMs and therefore do not count under the 700 limit for deployed launchers. As noted below, when two additional Trident submarines return to the fleet, the United States will have the treaty-permitted 700 deployed launchers and it will adjust the number of warheads on deployed SLBMs to meet the treaty limit of 1,550 warheads.

The United States did not have to destroy many ICBM or SLBM launchers to reach the limits in New START. The treaty includes provisions that allowed the United States to exempt many of its existing nondeployed launchers, including 94 B-1 bombers, and 4 ballistic missile submarines that have been converted to carry cruise missiles, from treaty limits. Moreover, as it reduced its deployed forces, the United States did not have to destroy either ICBM or SLBM launchers; it could deactivate them so that they could no longer launch ballistic missiles. Instead of eliminating missiles and launchers, the United States reached the limits in New START by deploying its missiles with far fewer than the maximum number of warheads that each could be equipped to carry. The Air Force has completed the deactivation of 50 Minuteman III missiles that will be removed from the force under New START, and the Navy has completed the elimination of four launch tubes on all 14 of its Trident submarines.

b. This force assumes that the United States retains 14 Trident submarines, with 2 submarines in overhaul, but that each has only 20 deployed launchers. It also assumes that the Air Force maintains all 450 Minuteman III silos, but places 50 in "warm" status. This appears to be the Air Force preferred option at this time, although the final force structure decision is still pending.

Russian Forces

On February 5, 2018, when the treaty reductions were complete, Russia announced that it had reduced its forces to 1,444 warheads on 527 deployed ICBMs, SLBMs, and heavy bombers, within a total of 779 deployed and nondeployed launchers.[83]

During the implementation of New START, the number of warheads deployed on Russian missiles and bombers climbed above the New START limits, leading some to express concerns about Russia's intention to comply with the treaty. Others noted that this was a reflection of Russia's modernization program, as it deployed new multiple-warhead ballistic missiles in place of older single-warhead missiles, and waited until late in the implementation process to eliminate older multiple-warhead land-based missile. Russia also retired many of its older ballistic missile submarines, replacing them with several new Borey-class submarines; three of these have entered the force, and three more are under construction. This submarine is deployed with the new Bulava missile. The missile failed many of its early flight tests, and continues to experience some failed tests, although it has had more several successful tests since late 2010.

force. This table assumes that, under New START, Russia's new RS-24 missile would carry four warheads. However, according to accounts in the Russian press this missile will carry "no fewer than 4" warheads. If each of these missiles were to carry 6-7 warheads, Russia could retain the 1,550 warheads permitted by the treaty. Russia has announced plans to deploy a new heavy, liquid-fueled multiple-warhead missile to replace the SS-18, although this missile is not likely to enter the force until at least 2020.

Ratification

U.S. Ratification Process

The Obama Administration submitted the New START Treaty to the Senate on May 13, 2010. The treaty package included the treaty text, the Protocol, the Annexes, the Article-by-Article analysis prepared by the Administration, and the 1251 report on future plans and budgets for U.S. nuclear weapons required by Congress. It also included the text of the unilateral statements made by the United States and Russia when they signed the treaty. The Senate offered its advice and consent to the ratification of the treaty by voting on a Resolution of Ratification. The treaty's approval requires a vote of two-thirds of the Senate, or 67 Senators.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee held 12 hearings on the treaty. These began in April 2009, with testimony from former Secretaries of Defense William Perry and James Schlesinger. In total, the committee received testimony from more than 20 witnesses from both inside and outside the Obama Administration. It received testimony from current senior officials from the State Department, the Defense Department, and the Department of Energy, and from several former officials from past Administrations. The committee completed its hearing process in mid-July, after receiving a National Intelligence Estimate on the future of Russian forces and a report on the verifiability of the treaty.

The Senate Armed Services Committee held a total of eight hearings and briefings on the treaty. The Armed Services Committee heard testimony from Secretary of State Clinton, Secretary of Defense Gates, Secretary of Energy Chu, and Admiral Mullen on June 17, 2010. It also received testimony and briefings from other Administration officials and from experts from outside the government. The Intelligence Committee also held a closed hearing to discuss U.S. monitoring capabilities and the verifiability of the treaty.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee held a business meeting to mark up the Resolution of Ratification for New START on September 16, 2010.[84] The committee began its consideration with a draft proposed by Senator Lugar, then addressed a number of amendments proposed by members of the committee. Both the Lugar draft and many of the proposed amendments addressed the members' concerns with U.S. missile defense programs, U.S. conventional prompt global strike capabilities, monitoring and verification, and Russian nonstrategic nuclear weapons. Most of these amendments were defeated, although the committee did modify and incorporate some into the resolution.[85]

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved the Resolution of Ratification by a vote of 14-4, and sent the resolution to the full Senate. The Senate did not address the treaty before the November elections. The Administration pressed the Senate to debate the treaty during the lame-duck session of Congress in December 2010. Many Senators supported this goal. Some, however, suggested that the Senate would not have time to debate the treaty during the lame-duck session, and indicated that they preferred the Senate wait until 2011 to debate the treaty.

The Senate began the debate on New START on December 16, 2010. During the debate, some Senators proposed amendments to the treaty, both to strike language related to ballistic missile defenses and to add language related to nonstrategic nuclear weapons. The treaty's supporters argued that these amendments would "kill" the treaty because they would require Russian approval and could lead to the reopening of negotiations on a wide range of issues addressed in the treaty. The Senate rejected these amendments, but it did accept amendments to the Resolution of Ratification that underlined the U.S. commitment to modernizing its nuclear weapons infrastructure and its commitment to deploying ballistic missile defenses. In addition, President Obama sent a letter to the Senators confirming his view that the New START Treaty places "no limitations on the development or deployment of our missile defense programs," highlighting his commitment to proceed with the deployment of all four phases of the missile defense system planned for Europe, and noting that the continued development and deployment of U.S. missile defenses would not threaten the strategic balance with Russia and would not "constitute the basis for questioning the effectiveness and viability of the New START Treaty."[86]

The Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification of New START on December 22, 2010, approving the Resolution of Ratification by a vote of 71-26. President Obama signed the instruments of ratification in early February 2011.

Russian Ratification Process

Russia's President Medvedev submitted the New START Treaty to the Russian Parliament on May 28, 2010. Both houses of the Russian Parliament, the Duma and the Federation Council, will vote on the treaty, with a majority vote required to approve the law on ratification. Russia's president said he hoped that the two sides could "synchronize" their ratification, voting on the treaty at about the same time. This would avoid the circumstances that existed on the second START Treaty in the late 1990s, when the U.S. Senate gave its consent to ratification of START II in January 1996, but by the time the Russian Parliament voted in 2000, the parties had negotiated a Protocol to the Treaty that also required ratification. The Senate never voted on the new version of the treaty, and START II never entered into force. Most experts agreed that President Medvedev should be able to win approval for the treaty in the Russian Parliament with little difficulty.

The Foreign Affairs Committee of the Russian Duma had initially supported the treaty. However, in early November 2010, Konstantin Kosachev, the head of the committee, indicated that the committee would reconsider the treaty. He indicated that this was in response to both the delay in the U.S. Senate's consideration of the treaty and the conditions and understandings that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee included in the U.S. Resolution of Ratification. Nevertheless, after the Senate voted on the treaty on December 22, members of the Duma called for the prompt ratification of New START. Reports indicated they received the documents from the Senate on December 23, and they held their first vote on the Draft Law on Ratification by Friday, December 24. The Duma then crafted amendments and declarations to the Federal Law on Ratification, and, after two more votes, approved the treaty by a vote of 350-96 (with one abstention) on January 25, 2011.

The upper chamber of Russia's parliament, the Federation Council, also voted on the ratification of the treaty. Sergei Mironov, the Speaker of the Federation Council, indicated that the vote would take place after the vote in the Duma.[87] This occurred on January 26, 2011, when the Federation Council unanimously approved the ratification of the treaty.[88] President Medvedev signed the instruments of ratification on January 28, 2011. Russia's Federal Law on Ratification contains a number of declarations and understandings that highlight the Duma and Federation Council's concerns with the New START Treaty. These do not alter the text of the treaty and, therefore, did not require U.S. consent or agreement. Many of the provisions in the law call on Russia's leadership to pursue funding for the modernization and sustainment of Russia's strategic nuclear forces. They also reiterate Russia's view that the preamble to the treaty, and its reference to the relationship between offensive and defense forces, is an integral part of the treaty. The law does not indicate that this language imposes any restrictions on the United States. It does, however, reiterate that Russia has a right to withdraw from the treaty, and could do so if the United States deploys defenses that undermine Russia's strategic deterrent. In addition, the law indicates that new kinds of strategic offensive weapons, such as the potential U.S. conventional prompt global strike weapons, should count under the treaty limits. The law indicates that the parties should meet in the BCC and agree on how to count these systems before either party deploys the system. This differs from the U.S. interpretation because the United States has indicated that it could deploy such systems before completing the discussions in the BCC. These differing interpretations did not delay the entry into force of the treaty, but could raise questions in the future, if the United States deploys a PGS system that it does not consider to count under the treaty limits.

Entry into Force and Implementation

Secretary Clinton and Foreign Minister Lavrov exchanged the instruments of ratification for the New START Treaty on February 5, 2011. This act brought the treaty into force and started the clock on early activities outlined in the treaty. For example, the United States and Russia conducted their initial data exchange, 45 days after the treaty entered into force, on March 22, 2011, within 45 days of entry into force. They also had the right to begin on-site inspection activities in early April, 60 days after the treaty entered into force. Reports indicate that this process began in the United States with the display of a B-1 bomber and in Russia with the display of Russia's new RS-24 missile.

Consultations

The United States and Russia also met in Geneva, from March 28 through April 8, 2011, in the first meeting of the treaty's Bilateral Consultative Commission. The representatives issued two joint statements at the conclusion of the meeting that addressed procedures that would be used during the on-site inspection process. The parties met for the second session of the BCC from October 19 to November 2, 2011.

The third meeting of the BCC occurred in late January 2012. During that meeting, the parties signed several statements on the sharing telemetry on missile test launches. They agreed that they would exchange telemetric data on one ICBM or SLBM launch that had occurred between February 5, 2011, when the treaty entered into force, and the end of 2011. They also agreed on when they would begin and end the sharing of telemetric data during the flight test of an ICBM or SLBM. They also agreed on the procedures they would use when demonstrating the recording media and playback equipment used when providing telemetric information.[89]

The BCC met for a fourth time in September 2012. During this meeting, the two sides agreed on the use of tamper detection equipment during on-site inspections. The BCC met again in February 2013. At this meeting, the two sides signed an agreement indicating that they would exchange telemetry on the launch of ICBM or one SLBM during the time between January 1 and December 31, 2012.[90] The BCC met again in January 2014, with the two sides, again, agreeing that they would exchange telemetric information on the launch of one ICBM or SLBM from 2013. They also agreed to use an additional measuring device during reentry vehicle inspections at SSBN bases. In October 2016, the parties met in the 12th session of the BCC; the State Department did not provide any public details about the substance of the meeting. The 13th session of the BCC met from late March to mid-April 2017; the State Department, again, did not offer any details about the substance of the meeting.

According to a State Department Fact Sheet released at the conclusion of the reduction period, on February 5, 2018, the two sides conducted a total of "14 meetings of the Treaty's Bilateral Consultative Commission (twice each Treaty year) to discuss issues related to implementation, with no interruption to the Parties' work during global crises causing friction elsewhere in the bilateral relationship."[91] Two sessions also occurred in 2018 and 2019. The United States and Russia agreed, however, to delay the March 2020 meeting in response to the coronavirus outbreak until later in the fall 2020. If the treaty expires in February 2021, this will be the last meeting of the BCC.[92]

Reductions

In a data exchange released in February 2011, with numbers drawn from the treaty's initial data exchange, the U.S. State Department noted that the United States had 1,800 warheads on 882 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers.[93] These deployed forces were within a total of 1,124 deployed and nondeployed launchers of ICBMs and SLBMs, and deployed in nondeployed heavy bombers. By September 2011, the United States had reduced these numbers to 1,790 warheads on 882 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers.[94] The total number of deployed and nondeployed launchers had declined to 1,043. The reduction in 81 nondeployed launchers likely reflects the conversion or elimination of some of the "phantom" launchers that remained in the U.S. force but no longer carried nuclear warheads. In the most recent exchange, with data current as of April 1, 2014, the United States indicated that it had 778 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 952 deployed and nondeployed launchers. It also indicated that these deployed forces carry a total of 1,585 warheads.

In data released on January 1, 2015, from the exchange that occurred on September 1, 2014, the United States had 794 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 912 deployed and nondeployed launchers. It also indicated that these deployed forces carry a total of 1,642 warheads. The increase in deployed forces reported in this exchange likely reflected the return to service of one SSBN, after it completed its overhaul process. The numbers declined again, by the time of the October 2015 exchange, both because another SSBN has begun its overhaul and because the U.S. Air Force has completed the "de-MIRVing" of the ICBM force. Each Minuteman III missile now carries a single warhead.

In addition, in September 2015, the Air Force announced that it had begun to convert a portion of the B-52H bomber force from nuclear to conventional-only capability, thus removing 30 operational bombers from accountability under New START.[95] While the Air Force has not provided any public statements about the changes made to the B-52 bombers, these changes are likely consistent with the objective of rendering the bombers unable to carry or launch nuclear-armed cruise missiles.

According to the State Department, as of September 1, 2016,[96] the United States had a force of 1,367 warheads on 681 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 848 deployed and nondeployed launchers. This included 416 deployed ICBM launchers, with a total of 454 deployed and nondeployed ICBM launchers; 209 deployed SLBM launchers within a total of 320 deployed and nondeployed launchers; 10 deployed B-2 bombers, within a total of 20 deployed and nondeployed B-2 bombers; and 46 deployed B-52 bombers, within a total of 54 deployed and nondeployed B-52 bombers. These data show that the United States has continued to convert B-52 bombers from nuclear to conventional-only capability; to remove ICBMs from operational launchers, on the path to 400 deployed ICBM launchers; and to reduce the number of launchers from 24 to 20 on each ballistic missile submarine. The data released in April 2017, from the March 1, 2017, data exchange, show that the United States counted 1,411 warheads on 673 deployed launchers, within a total of 820 deployed and nondeployed launchers. The increase in warheads possibly reflects the return to service of ballistic missile submarines, following the elimination of the four excess launchers.

The data exchange from September 2017, which shows the U.S. aggregate numbers of warheads and launchers, indicates that United States had met the New START limits. At that time it had 1,393 warheads on 660 deployed launchers, within a total of 800 deployed and nondeployed launchers.

Some analysts questioned whether the U.S. reductions through September 2016, which placed the United States below the New START limits of 1,550 warheads on 700 deployed launchers, indicated that the Obama Administration had decided to reduce U.S. nuclear forces, unilaterally, to levels below the New START limits.[97] However, these reductions were temporary, and the

[97] Bill Gertz, "Russia Adds Hundreds of Warheads Under Nuclear Treaty," Washington Free Beacon, October 5, 2016. In a speech in Berlin, in June 2013, President Obama announced that the Pentagon had concluded that the United States could maintain a robust deterrent with one-third fewer warheads than the 1,550 permitted by New START. He did, number of deployed launchers and warheads has now risen and should reach the levels permitted by the treaty when implementation is complete in 2018. For example, while the United States was reducing the number of launch tubes on deployed submarines, it removed them from deployment and removed the missiles from the launchers. These launchers and warheads did not count in the deployed force. Because each submarine now counts as 20 launchers, the September 2017 total of 660 deployed launchers can be read to indicate that two submarines, with 40 launchers, were still in nondeployed status at the time.

The data exchanges from 2018, 2019, and 2020 show that the United States continues to have fewer than the permitted number of deployed missiles and warheads, as it continues to remove systems from deployment for short periods of time. In September 2018, it reported that it had 1,398 warheads deployed on 659 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 800 deployed and nondeployed launchers for missiles and bombers. On March 1, 2019, it reported that it had 1,365 warheads deployed on 656 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 800 deployed and nondeployed launchers for missiles and bombers. On September 1, 2019, it reported that it had 1,376 warheads deployed on 668 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 800 deployed and nondeployed launchers for missiles and bombers. On March 1, 2020, it reported that it had 1,373 warheads deployed on 655 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 800 deployed and nondeployed launchers for missiles and bombers.

On September 1, 2020, the State Department reported that the United States had 1,457 warheads deployed on 675 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 800 deployed and nondeployed launchers for missiles and bombers.[98] This increase of 20 deployed strategic launchers and 84 deployed strategic warheads over the March 2020 data likely represents the move from maintenance to deployment of an additional ballistic missile submarine, which would carry 20 SLBM launchers.

The State Department fact sheets also include the summary of Russia's force data. In February 2011, Russia reported that it had 1,537 warheads on 521 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers. Russia also reported a total of 865 deployed and nondeployed delivery vehicles. At the time of this report, analysts expressed surprise that Russian forces were already below the treaty limits in New START when the treaty entered into force. Some argued that this indicated the United States did not have to sign the treaty to bring about reductions in Russian forces, and that the treaty represented unilateral concessions by the United States. Others noted that the number of deployed warheads possibly reflected the ongoing retirement of older Russian missiles and could change in the future as Russia deployed new, multiple-warhead land-based missiles. In September 2011, in the second treaty data exchange, Russia reported that it had 1,566 deployed warheads on 516 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers. Hence, although the number of deployed delivery vehicles declined, the number of warheads increased by a small amount, and then exceeded the treaty limit of 1,550 warheads. Because the data provide no details of the force composition, this increase could have been due either to the deployment of the new MIRVed RS-24 missiles, which carry more warheads than the single-warhead SS-25 missile they replace, or to variations in the numbers of warheads carried on deployed SLBMs. The number of deployed and nondeployed delivery vehicles had increased slightly, to 871. This could reflect the retirement of some of Russia's older missiles, which would move their delivery vehicles from the deployed to nondeployed column in the data.

In the data exchange from April 1, 2014, Russia reported that it had 498 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 906 deployed and nondeployed launchers. It also indicated that these deployed forces carry a total of 1,512 warheads. In the data exchanged in September 2014, and released in January 2015, Russia reported a force of 528 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 911 deployed and nondeployed launchers. It also indicated that these deployed forces carried a total of 1,643 warheads. Within these totals, Russia continued to deploy some new ICBMs and SLBMs while retiring older systems. However, as all categories had increased since the last data exchange, new deployments seemed to be outpacing retirements. This continued over the past year, as, in March 2016—when Russia reported that it had 1,735 warheads on 521 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 856 deployed and nondeployed launchers. The pattern shifted a little in September 2016—when Russia reported that it had 1,796 warheads on 508 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 847 deployed and nondeployed launchers—as the number of warheads continues to rise while the number of deployed and nondeployed launchers has declined.

The data exchanged in March 2017 show that Russia had begun to reduce the number of deployed warheads while increasing the number of deployed launchers—at that point it counted 1,765 warheads on 523 deployed launchers, within a total of 816 deployed and nondeployed launchers. The September 2017 data reinforce this trend. Russia reported a force 1,561 warheads, only 11 over the limit of 1,550 deployed warheads, on 503 deployed launchers. Hence, Russia appeared to be reducing older systems with larger numbers of warheads, while still deploying new missiles with fewer warheads, as it headed toward the New START limits by February 2018. On February 5, 2018, Russia reported that it had met the New START limits, with 1,444 warheads on 527 deployed ICBMs, SLBMs, and heavy bombers, within a total of 779 deployed and nondeployed launchers.[99]

The data exchanges from 2018, 2019, and 2020 show that the Russia continues to comply with the New START limits. In September 2018, it reported that it had 1,420 warheads deployed on 517 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 775 deployed and nondeployed launchers for missiles and bombers. On March 1, 2019, it reported that it had 1,461 warheads deployed on 524 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 760 deployed and nondeployed launchers for missiles and bombers. On September 1, 2019, it reported that it had 1,426 warheads deployed on 513 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 757 deployed and nondeployed launchers for missiles and bombers.

On March 1, 2020, Russia reported that it had 1,326 warheads deployed on 485 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 754 deployed and nondeployed launchers for missiles and bombers. Although the State Department does not provide details on the underlying force structure, one analyst attributed the decline in the number of deployed launchers and deployed warheads to the possible deactivation of a regiment of SS-18 ICBMs and the possible withdrawal of some Topol ICBMs.[100] On September 1, 2020, Russia reported that it had 1,447 warheads deployed on 510 deployed ICBMs, deployed SLBMs, and deployed heavy bombers, within a total of 764 deployed and nondeployed launchers for missiles and bombers. According to one analyst, increase of 25 deployed launchers and 121 deployed strategic warheads likely "reflects fluctuations caused by launcher maintenance and upgrade work to new systems."[101]

Some analysts questioned whether the increase in Russian warheads reported in March 2016 and September 2016 indicated that Russia would eventually withdraw from New START without reducing to its limit of 1,550 deployed warheads.[102] Others, however, noted that Russia did not need to meet the limits until February 2018, so the warhead levels in 2016 should not be of concern. They also noted that Russia continues to deploy new systems, like a third new submarine and new multiple-warhead land-based missiles, at a faster pace than it has retired older systems.[103] Hence, as Russia retired older multiple-warhead missiles before the deadline, it succeeded in reducing its forces below the limit of 1,550 warheads.

Some have also suggested that Russia's continuing deployment of new missiles systems, and its plans for modernization through the next 5-10 years, indicate that Russia may be prepared to exceed the limits under New START, either before or shortly after the treaty's 2021 expiration.[104] They have suggested that the United States respond to Russia's plans with its own plans to modernize and expand its nuclear forces. Others, however, while agreeing with assessments of Russia's ability to expand its nuclear forces, argue that the United States should respond by pressing Russia to extend New START through 2026 so that limits on Russian forces remain in place.

Monitoring, Verification, and Compliance

The United States has not raised any questions, in public, about Russia's compliance with the New START Treaty. In the January 2016 version of the Annual Report on Implementation of the New START Treaty, the State Department reported that "the United States certifies the Russian Federation to be in compliance with the terms of the New START Treaty." The report indicated that the United States "has raised implementation-related questions with the Russian Federation through diplomatic channels and in the context of the Bilateral Consultative Commission (BCC)."[105]

Russia has also raised questions about U.S. implementation during BCC sessions. In its statement released on February 5, 2018, the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs indicated that it had concerns with the conversion procedures the United States had used to eliminate some missile launchers and B-52 bombers from its force structure. It noted that Russia could not verify that the conversions had been done in a way that permanently "rules out the use of Trident II submarine-launched ballistic submarines and nuclear weapons of heavy bombers."[106] The Protocol to New START states the parties must demonstrate their elimination procedures if there is a question about whether the method meets the treaty terms, but it does not allow for the other party to object and require changes in the procedures. As a result, although the United States has insisted that its procedures are sufficient, Russia continues to question this conclusion. Russian officials have indicated that the United States should address Russia's concerns with these procedures before the two parties agree to extend New START before it expires in 2021.

In a joint briefing provided by the United States and Russia in October 2011, the parties that, in the first six months of treaty implementation, they had exchanged almost 1,500 notifications and had conducted demonstrations of telemetric information playback equipment. By the end of the first year of implementation, on February 5, 2012, the parties had exchanged over 1,800 notifications. They had also conducted three required exhibitions, with Russia exhibiting the RS-24 missile and its launcher, and the United States exhibiting the B-1 and B-2 bombers. During the year, both parties had also conducted all 18 of the permitted inspections at facilities in the other nation. These inspections occurred at ICBM, SLBM, and heavy bomber bases; storage facilities; conversion and elimination facilities; and test ranges.[107] In late November 2012, the State Department reported that the United States and Russia had each, as of November 26, conducted 15 of the 18 permitted inspections under the treaty. Both nations also completed their full complement of 18 inspections before the end of the second year of implementation, in February 2013.

According to the State Department, the United States and Russia both completed all 18 of their permitted Type 1 and Type 2 inspections during the first nine years of treaty implementation. They continued to conduct these inspections in spite of growing tensions after Russia's annexation of Crimea and aggression against Ukraine in early 2014. They have each conducted two inspections in the current treaty year, which began on February 5, but have suspended inspections through May 1, in response to the coronavirus outbreak. According to the State Department, the two sides also exchanged 19,852 notifications by late April 1, 2020. These notifications report on the location, movement, and disposition of strategic offensive arms. They have also completed at least 15 exhibitions to demonstrate distinguishing features and technical characteristics of new types of strategic offensive arms or demonstrate the results of a conversion of a strategic offensive arm subject to New START through early 2018.[108] This includes the November 2018 exhibition of Russia's new Avangard hypersonic glide vehicle. These monitoring activities will continue through 2021, or 2026 if New START is extended.

Issues for Congress

New START and Strategic Stability

When the Obama Administration released the 2010 Nuclear Posture Review, it indicated that the United States would retain a triad of ICBMs, SLBMs, and heavy bombers under the New START Treaty. The NPR indicates that this force structure supports strategic stability because it allows the United States to maintain an "assured second-strike capability" with warheads on survivable ballistic missile submarines and allows the United States to retain "sufficient force structure in each leg to ... hedge effectively ... if necessary due to unexpected technological problems or operational vulnerabilities."[109] The Trump Administration, in the 2018 NPR, also reaffirmed the support for the nuclear triad. Although it offered a more detailed rationale for the maintenance of a triad, the underlying themes of strengthening deterrence and supporting stability were part of the discussion.

Obama Administration officials also indicated that New START promoted strategic stability by "discounting" the weapons on heavy bombers. As President Reagan argued during his commencement address at Eureka College in 1982, ballistic missiles are the "most destabilizing nuclear systems."[110] As a result, in his START proposals, President Reagan sought deep reductions in ballistic missile warheads, but lesser reductions in the weapons on heavy bombers. The counting rules in New START reflect this logic. Because bomber weapons would take hours or days to reach their targets, and because they could be recalled after they were launched, they pose less of a threat to strategic stability than do ballistic missiles. As a result, some argue that, even if the United States and Russia retain hundreds of bomber weapons that do not count against the treaty limits, the reductions required in ballistic missile warheads will enhance strategic stability.

Some have also noted that New START may strengthen strategic stability from the Russian perspective by removing the specific limits and restrictions on mobile ICBMs. Russia does not deploy many submarines at sea, and, therefore, lacks an assured second-strike capability on that leg of its triad. Instead, it has sought to improve the survivability of its forces by deploying ICBMs on mobile launchers. Under START, the United States sought to restrict these systems because it feared it would not be able to count them in peacetime and target them in wartime. In the current environment, concerns about wartime targeting played less of a role in the negotiations. Consequently, instead of limiting their numbers and restricting their operations, New START seeks to provide transparency and openness, so the United States can be confident in its ability to count these weapons in peacetime even though it might not be able to attack them during a conflict.

Critics of the New START Treaty have questioned whether it serves U.S. security interests even if it did promote strategic stability. Some argued, during the negotiations, that the United States did not need to negotiate a new treaty to maintain its own triad, as this was possible with or without arms control. They also argued that the United States did not need to reduce its forces to bring about reductions in Russia's forces, as Russia would reduce its forces over the next decade as it retired aging systems, even in the absence of a new arms control agreement.[111] Moreover, they questioned whether arms control should even be a part of the U.S.-Russian relationship, as arms control is a symbol of a Cold War, antagonistic relationship between the two nations. They believe that the United States and Russia should not measure their relationship with each other using Cold War-era measures like strategic stability and survivable warheads.

This last argument has faded as the U.S.-Russian relationship has changed over the past decade. Few now argue that arms control is irrelevant in the absence of an antagonistic relationship.

Instead, they dispute the value of arms control precisely because the major-power rivalry has returned and the United States and Russia now have a more antagonistic relationship. They note that this change has occurred in spite of the presence of New START, and, therefore, is evidence of the failure of arms control to either support or strengthen strategic stability. Moreover, they note that New START did not include any limits on Russian shorter-range nonstrategic nuclear weapons, and, therefore, failed to capture the full scope of threats that Russia presents to the United States and its allies.

Monitoring and Verification in New START

Monitoring and verification were among the central concerns addressed in the Senate committees during their review of the New START Treaty. The cooperative monitoring measures in the treaty received special scrutiny, as many observers of the arms control process specifically measured the value of the monitoring and verification regime in the original START Treaty by its widespread use of notifications, on-site inspections, and other cooperative measures.

Some critics of New START questioned whether the monitoring provisions in the new treaty were sufficient to provide the United States with enough information to either confirm Russian compliance with the treaty or to detect efforts to violate its terms. They pointed to differences between the verification regime in the original START Treaty and those in New START to argue that the new verification regime is less robust than the old regime. They noted that the United States would no longer maintain a monitoring presence outside the Votkinsk facility where Russia assembles its mobile ICBMs, which, they argued, could weaken the U.S. ability to count these missiles as they entered Russia's forces. They also noted that the United States and Russia would no longer exchange telemetry data on all their ballistic missile flight tests, which, over time, could lessen the U.S. ability to understand and evaluate the capabilities of Russian ballistic missiles.

Marshall Billingslea, who served in the Trump Administration as the State Department's Special Presidential Envoy for Arms Control, raised similar concerns, arguing that the monitoring provisions in New START were insufficient because they were different from those in the original START Treaty. He stated that, during the negotiations in late 2020, the United States would insist that Russia accept more robust provisions governing on-site inspections and telemetry exchanges.[112]

The Obama Administration and others who supported the new treaty argued that the verification regime in New START would be more than sufficient to provide the United States with confidence in Russia's compliance with the treaty. They acknowledged that the regime is different from the regime in the original START Treaty, but noted that this was, in part, due to improvements in the relationship between Russia and the United States and differences between the limits and restrictions in the two treaties. They argued that the monitoring regime in New START was streamlined, both to reduce its costs and to ease the disruptions caused by monitoring for U.S. and Russian military forces. They also noted that it relied on as much or more cooperation between the two parties, which would continue to build confidence and reduce suspicions.

Moreover, many in the Obama Administration noted that the United States had not had any opportunity to monitor Russian forces on Russian territory since the original treaty expired in December 2009. They argued that continuing delays in Senate consideration of New START could further reduce U.S. and Russian confidence in their knowledge of each other's forces, leading to worst-case assessments and possible instabilities. They further reminded those who contend that the verification regime in New START is less robust than the regime in old START that the absence of a treaty would have meant the absence of any monitoring and verification regime. The United States did not have the option of returning the regime of the original START Treaty; nor should it have wanted to do so since the new treaty has different limits and restrictions than the old treaty. Many U.S. officials, including Admiral Mullen and General Chilton, included their concerns about the absence of monitoring in their appeals for the prompt ratification of the New START Treaty.

Questions about the monitoring and verification regime in New START go beyond concerns about the specific monitoring mechanisms and the U.S. ability to confirm Russian compliance with individual limits in the treaty. Most experts agree that neither party can be absolutely certain that the other is in perfect compliance with all the limits and restrictions in the treaty. This is due, in some cases, to ambiguities in the treaty language and varying interpretations of the treaty requirements. It is also due to the fact that both sides may have gaps in their knowledge about the details of the other side's forces and activities. These uncertainties do not, by themselves, indicate that the parties should not ratify and implement the treaty. The broader question often asked by experts on treaty monitoring and verification is whether the parties, in general, and the United States, in particular, will have high confidence in Russia's compliance with the treaty, and, in those cases when compliance concerns may come up, whether the United States will be able to detect evidence of potential violations that might undermine U.S. security with enough warning to respond and adjust U.S. forces to offset those security concerns.

The Obama Administration indicated, in documents submitted to the Senate in July 2010, that the New START Treaty met this standard. The Administration concluded that the benefits to Russia of cheating would be minimal, as the United States, by maintaining a triad of ICBMs, SLBMs, and bombers, would be able to respond to any attempt to shift the strategic balance by adding significant numbers of warheads to its own forces. Moreover, if Russia were to cheat to any significant degree, it would undermine its relationship with the United States and interfere with any possible future arms control agreements. Therefore, in a letter sent to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in September 2010, Secretary of Defense Gates concluded that Russia would not be able to achieve "militarily significant cheating" under the New START Treaty.[113]

A review of the verification regime in New START, and summary of some of the differences between the verification regime in the original START Treaty and the regime in New START can be found in CRS Report R41201, Monitoring and Verification in Arms Control.

New START and Ballistic Missile Defenses

As was noted above, during the debate over New START the Obama Administration testified repeatedly that the New START Treaty imposes no limits on current or planned ballistic missile defense programs in the United States. Some critics have claimed, however, that the United States might impose those limits itself, to ensure that Russia does not withdraw from New START, as it said it might do in the unilateral statement it released when it signed the treaty.

Officials from the Obama Administration argued that this concern was unfounded. They noted that the Soviet Union issued a similar statement when it signed the original START Treaty, threatening to withdraw if the United States withdrew from the 1972 Anti-ballistic Missile (ABM Treaty). Yet, when the United States withdrew from the ABM Treaty in 2002, Russia not only did not withdraw from START, it continued to participate in negotiations on the 2002 Strategic Offensive Reductions Treaty. Moreover, in the 1990s, when the United States might have altered its missile defense plans in response to the Soviet letter, the United States actually expanded its missile defense activities and increased spending on missile defense programs. As a result, there is little reason, based on historical data, to expect the United States to restrain its missile defense programs. Moreover, officials from the Obama Administration have highlighted that the Ballistic Missile Defense Review, the Nuclear Posture Review, and the 2011 budget all offer strong support for continuing U.S. missile defense programs.[114]

Some critics have also claimed that Russia might seek, and the United States might agree to, new limits on U.S. missile defense capabilities in the Bilateral Consultative Commission established by the treaty. According to the Protocol to New START, this commission is designed "to promote the implementation of the provisions of the Treaty." The Protocol indicates that the United States and Russia will meet in the commission to "resolve questions relating to compliance with the obligations assumed by the Parties," agree on "additional measures as may be necessary to improve the viability and effectiveness of the Treaty," and "discuss other issues raised by either Party." Some have claimed that because this agenda is somewhat open-ended, Russia may raise its concerns about U.S. missile defenses in the commission and propose limits on those systems.

The Obama Administration insisted that the parties could not, and would not use the BCC to negotiate new limits on ballistic missile defenses or any other elements of the U.S. strategic arsenal. In a fact sheet that accompanies the treaty, the State Department has indicated that the parties would use the BCC "to reach agreement on changes in the Protocol to the Treaty, including its Annexes, that do not affect substantive rights or obligations. The BCC may in no way make changes that would affect the substantive rights and obligations contained in the New START Treaty."[115] The parties may use the BCC to "agree upon such additional measures as may be necessary to improve the viability and effectiveness of the Treaty" but these measures would address concerns that came up while implementing the existing limits and restrictions in the treaty. They would not be able to impose new limits or restrictions without amending the treaty, and any amendment to the treaty would be subject to the same ratification process as the treaty itself. The Senate would have to offer its advice and consent.

Although the Obama Administration pursued discussions with Russia on missile defense issues for several years, it never accepted any limitations on U.S. missile defense programs and insisted, repeatedly, that U.S. missile defense programs were not designed or capable of undermining Russia's ballistic missile defenses. Russia, however, continued to question U.S. intentions and press for limits on ballistic missile defenses. It has insisted that any negotiations on further reductions in nuclear weapons include discussions about limits on ballistic missile defenses.

Congress remains concerned about the possibility that the United States might accept limits on missile defenses in exchange for limits on offensive nuclear forces. Senator Barrasso raised this issue in a hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on September 18, 2018. He asked officials from the State Department and Defense Department to assure him that "in any arms control discussions with Russia for which you're responsible that the United States will not agree to limiting our own missile defense programs." Both Under Secretary of State Andrea Thompson and Under Secretary of Defense David Trachtenberg provided those assurances.[116]

Modernization

The New START Treaty does not limit or restrict the ability of the United States or Russia to modernize strategic offensive nuclear forces. It specifically states, in Article V, paragraph 1, that, "Subject to the provisions of this Treaty, modernization and replacement of strategic offensive arms may be carried out." Both nations are currently modernizing their forces and replacing aging missiles, submarines, and bombers.

Moreover, while some Members of the Senate insisted that the Obama Administration commit to modernizing the U.S. nuclear arsenal before voting in support of the treaty, many have also indicated that their continuing support for the modernization programs is linked to ongoing implementation of New START. Several Senators emphasized this linkage during a hearing in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in September 2018. Senator Menendez noted that "bipartisan support for nuclear modernization is tied to maintaining an arms-control process that controls and seeks to reduce Russian nuclear forces." Senator Corker pointed out that, when the Senate gave its consent to the ratification of New START, "there was no doubt" about the "tie between the two." He stated that "the essence of this is that the modernization piece, and the reduction in warheads piece go hand in hand."[117]

U.S. Modernization

The United States is currently recapitalizing all three legs of its nuclear triad, with replacements planned for its bombers, air-delivered cruise missiles, land-based ballistic missiles, and ballistic missile submarines over the next 20 years.[118] It is also pursuing life extension programs for many of the warheads in the U.S. stockpile, to ensure that the weapons remain safe, secure, and effective. The Obama Administration outlined much of this modernization program in a report, known as the 1251 Report, mandated by Congress in the FY2010 Defense Authorization Act (P.L. 111-84, §1251). This provision required the Administration to submit a report to Congress when it submitted the New START Treaty to the Senate that described how it planned to "enhance the safety, security, and reliability of the nuclear weapons stockpile of the United States; modernize the nuclear weapons complex; and maintain the delivery platforms for nuclear weapons." In this 1251 report, the Obama Administration stated that the United States planned to spend $180 billion over the next 10 years to meet these objectives, with $80 billion allocated to the U.S. nuclear weapons complex and nuclear warheads and $100 billion allocated to the Navy and Air Force for the maintenance and modernization of their delivery systems. The program has expanded over the years, and, although cost estimates vary, the Congressional Budget Office has estimated that the United States is likely to spend around $350 billion over 10 years and $1.2 trillion over 30 years to modernize its nuclear arsenal. In the 2018 Nuclear Posture Review, the Trump Administration reaffirmed its support for the continuing modernization of the U.S. nuclear triad, advocating for the completion of all the programs initiated under the Obama Administration, while adding two new systems to the plan.[119]

During the debate over New START's ratification, some Members of Congress and analysts outside government questioned whether the Obama Administration was sufficiently committed to modernizing and maintaining its strategic nuclear forces, nuclear weapons complex, and nuclear warheads. Some also questioned whether the funding in the program would be sufficient to maintain and sustain the U.S. nuclear arsenal. Some argued that the totals did not add enough above the previously planned program to go far in expanding the U.S. capability to maintain and modernize its forces. Others questioned whether the Administration would sustain its commitment for more than a year or two, particularly in an era of tight defense budgets. These concerns grew as the fiscal constraints imposed through the Budget Control Act in 2011 reduced the resources available for modernization in the nuclear enterprise and have led to delays in some programs.

Others, however, argued that the Obama Administration's budget for the nuclear weapons complex in FY2011 and the added funding outlined in the 1251 report demonstrated a strong commitment to recapitalizing the U.S. nuclear weapons complex, maintaining nuclear warheads, and maintaining and modernizing the delivery vehicles. The Administration added nearly 10%, or over $700 million, to the DOE budget for nuclear weapons in FY2011. Ambassador Linton Brooks, who had served as the Director of the National Nuclear Security Administration during the Bush Administration, indicated that he would have "killed" for a budget of that magnitude when he was managing the nuclear weapons complex for DOE.[120] While the 2011 Budget Control Act required some delays in planned spending on nuclear weapons modernization, the Obama and Trump Administrations' budget proposals continued to show increases above the levels expected before the ratification of New START.

Russian Modernization

Russia is also deploying new missiles, submarines, and bombers to replace aging systems within the limits of New START. At the same time, it may be developing new types of strategic offensive arms that might not be captured by the limits in the treaty. In his annual address on March 1, 2018, Russian President Putin announced that Russia was developing several new nuclear delivery vehicles that could evade or penetrate U.S. ballistic missile defenses.[121] One of the new weapons mentioned in the speech, the large, multiple-warhead ICBM known as the Sarmat, would by most estimates clearly count under the New START Treaty.

However, other systems—including a long-range nuclear-powered cruise missile, a long-range nuclear-armed underwater drone, and an air-delivered hypersonic cruise missile—may not be covered by the treaty's definitions of existing types of strategic offensive systems. As was noted above, the treaty addresses the possible emergence of new types of strategic offensive arms in paragraph 2 of Article V, where it states that the parties should raise their concerns about such weapons in the BCC. It does not, however, indicate how the parties will resolve such questions or whether they must agree before a weapon is included or excluded from the treaty limits. According to Under Secretary of State Thompson, in September 2018, the United States had not yet questioned Russia about these systems. However, these weapons would only raise concerns under New START if they were deployed before the treaty expired. Many analysts doubt that this will happen since most of the weapons mentioned in the speech seem to be in the early stages of development.[122]

Nonstrategic Nuclear Weapons

Presidents Obama and Medvedev agreed, in April 2009, when they initiated the negotiations on the New START Treaty, that this agreement would address only strategic nuclear forces, the long-range weapons that each side could use to reach the territory of the other side. It would not seek to limit or restrict the shorter-range nonstrategic nuclear weapons in either side's arsenal. This agreement derived not only from the fact that the existing START Treaty, and nearly all past bilateral arms control treaties, had addressed only strategic nuclear weapons, but also from the fact that many of the issues that would need to be addressed in a treaty that limited nonstrategic nuclear weapons would likely prove too complex to resolve in the near term, when both sides sought to replace the existing START Treaty.

There was widespread agreement in Congress, in the Obama Administration, and within the arms control community, that the United States and Russia should seek to negotiate a treaty that increases transparency and possibly imposes limits on nonstrategic strategic nuclear weapons. However, there is also widespread agreement that negotiating such a treaty would prove extremely difficult, as Russia maintains a far larger stock of these weapons than the United States, in part to compensate for perceived weaknesses in its conventional forces, and because U.S. nonstrategic nuclear weapons are a part of the U.S. commitment to NATO, and the United States believes that any changes in their deployment should be addressed by the alliance before they are addressed in an arms control negotiation.

Some analysts and Senators questioned whether the United States should agree to further reductions in its strategic nuclear weapons in the absence of any limits on Russian nonstrategic nuclear weapons. They noted that Russia retains more than 2,000 operational nonstrategic nuclear weapons while the United States has around 200 in Europe, and that the value of these weapons could grow as the numbers of U.S. and Russian strategic nuclear weapons decline. They also noted that these weapons could seem particularly threatening to some of the new NATO states that are located near the periphery of Russia. Others however, argued that Russian nonstrategic nuclear weapons do not pose a threat to the United States or NATO, as Russia has indicated that these weapons would only be used in response to an attack on Russian territory. So, these analysts noted, as long as NATO does not initiate such an attack, NATO members would not be threatened by these weapons. Moreover, as Senator Lugar noted in his response to former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney's critique of New START, most of Russia's nonstrategic nuclear weapons do not pose a missile threat to Europe. Senator Lugar stated that "most of Russia's tactical nuclear weapons either have very short ranges, are used for homeland air defense, are devoted to the Chinese border, or are in storage."[123]

Many of the experts who testified in support of the New START Treaty agreed that the United States and Russia should pursue negotiations on a treaty on nonstrategic nuclear weapons. However, most agreed that Russia would be unwilling to participate in such discussions, and the United States and Russia would be unlikely to find common ground on such an agreement, unless both sides ratified and implemented the New START Treaty first. For example, in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on April 29, 2010, former Secretaries of Defense James Schlesinger and William Perry both indicated that nonstrategic nuclear weapons should be an issue for the next treaty, and that the United States should ratify New START as a step on the path to get to reduction in nonstrategic nuclear weapons.[124]

The Trump Administration, in the Nuclear Posture Review released on February 2, 2018, also expressed concerns about Russia's stockpile of nonstrategic nuclear weapons. While it did not advocate for the negotiation of a treaty specifically limiting these weapons, it did indicate that Russia would have to address these concerns before the United States would be willing to negotiate further reductions in strategic nuclear weapons. Thus, when it began discussions with Russia on New START extension in 2020, it insisted that Russia agree to link an extension to an agreement to freeze the number of warheads in its nuclear stockpile.

New START and the U.S. Nuclear Nonproliferation Agenda

The Obama Administration argued that U.S.-Russian cooperation on arms control, in general, and the New START Treaty, specifically, could help move forward the U.S. and international nuclear nonproliferation agenda. No one has argued that the treaty will convince nations who are seeking their own nuclear weapon that they should follow the U.S. and Russian lead and reduce those weapons or roll back those programs. However, some have argued that U.S.-Russian cooperation on arms control could strengthen the U.S.-Russian cooperation on a broader array of issues and that, "cooperation is a prerequisite for moving forward with tough, internationally binding sanctions on Iran."[125]

Moreover, some have noted that U.S.-Russian cooperation on arms control would also demonstrate that these nations are living up to their obligations under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT).[126] Most nations that are parties to the NPT believe that reductions in the number of deployed nuclear weapons are a clear indicator of U.S. and Russian compliance with their obligations under Article VI of the NPT.[127] During the preparatory committee meetings (PrepComs) leading up to the 2010 Review Conference of the NPT, many of the participants called on the United States and Russia to complete negotiations on a New START Treaty. While the completion of this treaty may not assure the United States of widespread agreement on U.S. goals and priorities at the NPT review conference, many argue that the absence of an agreement would have certainly complicated U.S. efforts and reduced the chances for a successful conference.

In contrast, some have argued that the New START Treaty will do little to advance U.S. nonproliferation goals. They noted that the parties at the NPT review conference may express their approval of the New START, but their positions on substantive issues would reflect their own national security interests and goals. Moreover, some critics argue that New START might undermine U.S. nonproliferation goals by calling into question U.S. security commitments and the continuing salience of U.S. nuclear weapons.

The State Department, in its press releasing announcing that the United States had met its obligation to reduce to the New START limits, noted that "the United States continues to demonstrate its commitment to fulfilling its arms control obligations, including under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons" through its adherence to the New START limits.[128]

U.S.-Russian Arms Control After New START

Prospects for Further Reductions

In 2010, when it signed the New START Treaty, the Obama Administration indicated that it hoped this would be the first step in a renewed arms control process with Russia. In his statement on April 8, 2010, President Obama indicated that "this treaty will set the stage for further cuts. And going forward, we hope to pursue discussions with Russia on reducing both our strategic and tactical weapons, including nondeployed weapons."[129] In his State of the Union Address on February 12, 2013, the President stated that, as a part of the "effort to prevent the spread of the world's most dangerous weapons," the United States would "engage Russia to seek further reductions in our nuclear arsenals."[130] Then, on June 19, 2013, in a speech in Berlin, President Obama stated that, after a comprehensive review, he had "determined that we can ensure the security of America and our allies, and maintain a strong and credible strategic deterrent, while reducing our deployed strategic nuclear weapons by up to one-third." He stated that he intended "to seek negotiated cuts with Russia to move beyond Cold War nuclear postures."[131]

Many analysts outside government supported the idea of further reductions beyond New START. They had hoped New START would cut more deeply into U.S. and Russian forces, reducing them to perhaps 1,000 warheads on each side. Others focused their concern on the absence of limits on nonstrategic nuclear weapons and nondeployed nuclear warheads. They expected a second treaty to address some of these concerns. Some suggested that the two sides pursue a single, comprehensive treaty that would limit strategic, nonstrategic, and nondeployed warheads. This was similar to the approach that the Obama Administration appeared willing to pursue in 2013. Others suggested that the United States and Russia accelerate their reductions under New START, amend the treaty to reduce the numbers of permitted weapons, or agree informally to reduce their forces below New START levels. They argued that these steps, if the nations took them together, could enhance stability and reduce nuclear dangers, without waiting for the completion a new, lengthy treaty negotiation process.[132] Some also suggested that the United States and Russia could increase transparency on their nonstrategic nuclear weapons, even if they were not yet ready to agree to limits or reductions in these systems.

Some have also suggested that the United States and Russia revisit proposals from prior treaties—such a ban or limits on multiple-warhead (MIRVed) missiles—as a way to not only deepen the reductions in deployed warheads but also to bolster stability in the strategic balance.[133] The United States and Russia agreed to ban land-based MIRVed missiles in the 1993 START II Treaty, as a way to reduce the vulnerability of land-based weapons and to ease the pressure to launch these weapons early in a crisis. They never implemented this ban, as the START II Treaty never entered into force, but concerns about crisis stability remain as Russia's modernization program includes the development of a new large, MIRVed land-based missile. On the other hand, Russia considers MIRVed land-based missiles to be a part of its response to U.S. ballistic missile defenses, and is unlikely to accept such a proposal.

Others, however, disputed the notion that the United States and Russia should follow New START with further reductions in nuclear weapons. While some were willing to support the modest reductions of New START, they would not have supported a treaty that imposed deeper reductions. They also objected to the broader arms control agenda that President Obama had outlined in his speech in Prague on April 5, 2009, including his call for the ratification of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and his vision of a world free of nuclear weapons. Hence, some who concluded that the New START Treaty would not harm U.S. security by itself objected to its ratification because they believed its defeat would close the door on the rest of the President's arms control agenda.

Russia has also questioned whether New START was the first step towards deeper reductions. Shortly after the treaty entered into force, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov stated that Russia would not want to pursue further negotiations until New START had been implemented. Russian officials have stated, repeatedly, that a treaty mandating further reductions would not only have to include limits on U.S. ballistic missile defenses and nonnuclear strategic strike systems, but would also have to limit the forces of the other major nuclear powers.

Most experts agree that a new treaty that addressed each of these issues raised by both parties would likely be extremely difficult to complete. Russia has been unwilling to negotiate reductions in its nonstrategic nuclear weapons, and neither side may be willing to adopt the amount of transparency necessary to negotiate verifiable limits on nondeployed warheads in storage. The United States has firmly rejected Russia's proposals for limits on ballistic missile defense and is unwilling to include conventional-armed cruise missiles or other long-range missiles in nuclear arms control negotiations. Moreover, Britain, France, and China—the other declared nuclear weapons states under the NPT—have not shown any willingness to participate in the U.S.-Russian arms control process.

Prospects for the negotiation of a follow-on treaty dimmed further in 2014, following Russia's annexation of Crimea and incursion into Ukraine. In addition, in July 2014, the Obama Administration—in its Annual Report on Adherence to and Compliance with Arms Control, Nonproliferation, and Disarmament Agreements and Commitments—stated that the United States "has determined that the Russian Federation is in violation of its obligations under the [1987] Intermediate Range Nuclear Forces (INF) Treaty not to possess, produce, or flight-test a ground-launched cruise missile (GLCM) with a range capability of 500 km to 5,500 km, or to possess or produce launchers of such missiles."[134] While Russia appeared to be complying with New START, most agreed that further negotiations would be unwise; some also suggested that the United States suspend its implementation of New START until Russia returned to compliance with the INF Treaty. Others, however, have argued that the United States should continue to implement New START, as the limits on the size of Russia's strategic forces and the transparency provided by its verification regime continue to serve U.S. national security interests.

Extending New START

Absent an agreement between the United States and Russia to extend New START for a period of no more than five years, the treaty will lapse in 2021. As was noted above, President Trump and President Putin reportedly discussed the treaty during their summit in Helsinki in July 2018, with President Putin presenting President Trump with a document suggesting that they extend the treaty after resolving "existing problems related to the Treaty implementation," but the two did not reach an agreement on the issue.[135] In the 2018 Nuclear Posture Review, the Trump Administration noted that the United States had met the treaty's central limits, and that it would "continue to implement the New START Treaty and verify Russian compliance." It did not, however, indicate whether it might seek an extension of the treaty and made it clear that it was unlikely to negotiate a new treaty before New START's expiration in 2021. It noted that the United States is committed to "arms control efforts that advance U.S., allied, and partner security; are verifiable and enforceable; and include partners that comply responsibly with their obligations." But it also noted that Russian actions, including its noncompliance with the INF Treaty and other arms control agreements, and its actions in Crimea and Ukraine made further progress difficult.[136]

The Trump Administration conducted an interagency review of New START to determine whether it continues to serve U.S. national security interests, has indicated that this review would inform the U.S. approach to the treaty's extension.[137] Administration officials addressed this review during testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on September 18, 2018.[138] Both Under Secretary of State Andrea Thompson and Deputy Under Secretary of Defense David Trachtenberg emphasized how Russia's violation of the INF Treaty and its more general approach to arms control undermined U.S. confidence in the arms control process. Under Secretary Thomson noted that "the value of any arms control agreement is derived from our treaty partners maintaining compliance with their obligations and avoiding actions that result in mistrust and the potential for miscalculation." She also said that Russia's noncompliance "has created a trust deficit that leads the United States to question Russia's commitment to arms control as a way to manage and stabilize our strategic relationship and promote greater transparency and predictability."

Several Senators questioned whether the Administration's review would include a broader assessment of whether the provisions in New START contributed to U.S. national security. They focused on both the benefits of the limits on U.S. and Russian nuclear forces and the value of the transparency provided by the monitoring and verification regime. Deputy Under Secretary Trachtenberg acknowledged that "the verification and monitoring and on-site inspection provisions provide a level of openness and transparency that is useful and beneficial not just to the United States but to our allies as well." But he reiterated that "any decision on extending the treaty will, and should be, based on a realistic assessment of whether the New START treaty remains in our national security interests in light of overall Russian arms control behavior."[139]

Senators held a similar conversation with Under Secretary Thompson and Deputy Under Secretary Trachtenberg during a hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on May 15, 2019. In this hearing, the two witnesses addressed concerns about Russia's development of new kinds of strategic offensive arms that would fall outside the New START limits, Russia's nonstrategic nuclear weapons that are not covered by the Treaty, and China's nuclear modernization programs. At the same time, Under Secretary Thompson refused to speculate about possible changes in Russian forces if the treaty were to expire, and Deputy Under Secretary Trachtenberg declined to offer insights into how the United States might alter its nuclear forces or how it might recover the data and information provided by New START's verification regime if the treaty were to expire.[140]

During this hearing, Undersecretary of State Andrea Thompson stated that the United States had begun to hold discussions with Russia about its new kinds of strategic weapons at the technical expert level. Russian officials have stated that some of its new strategic systems should not count under New START because they do not meet the treaty's definition of deployed missile launchers or heavy bombers. At the same time, they have recognized that the new 10-warhead land-based ballistic missile and the new Avangard missile-based hypersonic glide vehicle will count under New START. Russia conducted its static exhibition of the Avangard for U.S. treaty inspectors in November 2019 and, according to press reports, began to deploy the system in late December 2019.

Russia did not rejected U.S. proposals to address its new kinds of long-range delivery systems, but it has refused to count them under New START. Instead, it has suggested that the two sides discuss these weapons in a separate forum, that addresses concerns about strategic stability. It has indicated that this forum could meet in the years after the parties extend New START. Russia has not yet produced any of these weapons, and may produce only a small number between 2021 and 2026. So even if these weapons were not captured by New START, such discussions could occur before the weapons posed a significant threat to the United States or its allies.

As noted above, U.S. and Russian officials met in August 2020 and October 2020 to discuss the possible extension of New START. In August, Ambassador Billingslea made it clear that the United States would be willing to let New START lapse, but might agree to extend it for a short period of time if Russia agreed to sign a "politically binding statement" that included an outline for a follow-on treaty. The United States insisted that Russia agree, in this statement, to limit all its nuclear weapons under the next treaty, that it accept expanded monitoring and verification provisions in the framework for a subsequent treaty, and that it agree that China must participate in the negotiations when the parties converted the statement into a legally binding treaty. At the same time, the United States rejected Russia's proposals for limits on U.S. shorter-range nuclear weapons and for the United Kingdom and France to participate in future negotiations. Russian officials also indicated that they supported the extension of New START, but would not "pay any price" to reach that goal.[141]

In October, the United States narrowed its position by seeking to pair a short-term extension of New START with a short-term freeze on both sides' nuclear arsenals. The freeze would accommodate U.S. demands for limits on Russian nonstrategic nuclear weapons without addressing other issues in the August proposal. He also stated that Presidents Trump and Putin had reached an "agreement in principle" on this deal and that he and Deputy Foreign Minister Ryabkov could complete an agreement quickly. He seemed to imply that Ryabkov was either unaware of this agreement or had not yet received his instructions to complete the deal.[142]

Deputy Foreign Minister Ryabkov called the U.S. reports of a quick agreement "an illusion." He stated that the proposed freeze "is unacceptable" because it would not address Russian concerns about U.S. weapons. Ryabkov also disputed the U.S. assertion that the two sides could conclude the agreement before the election.

On October 16, President Putin proposed that the two sides extend New START "unconditionally for at least a year" while they continue talks on other arms control issues. President Trump's National Security Advisor, Robert O'Brien, dismissed this as a "non-starter" without the freeze on nuclear arsenals, and suggested that Russia's position could lead to "a costly arms race." On October 20, the Russian Foreign Ministry stated that Russia would accept a one-year freeze on nuclear arsenals if the United States did not add any conditions to the freeze. Russia also indicated the countries could "hold comprehensive bilateral talks" on "all factors that can influence strategic stability" during the extension. The U.S. State Department responded by welcoming the Russian statement and noting that the "United States is prepared to meet immediately to finalize a verifiable agreement." Russia, however, considers the requirement for verification to be an unacceptable condition added to the freeze.[143]

On October 22, President Putin repeated his call to extend the treaty and freeze weapons for a year, without preconditions. Deputy Foreign Minister Ryabkov and NSA O'Brien both acknowledged that the two sides remain at odds over whether to codify verification measures before extending New START or to work them out in discussions following the extension.[144] The United States and Russia did not resolve these differences before the end of the Trump Administration.

Reports indicate that the Biden Administration is likely to seek the prompt extension of New START. In November 2020, Anthony Blinken, designated at the incoming Secretary of State, suggested that President Biden would extend New START for five years and then would seek to expand the arms control process to include other types of weapons and additional countries.[145] Reports indicate, however, that some incoming Administration officials believe that an extension for less than five years would provide the United States with leverage in affecting the shape of a future agreement.[146] Officials from the outgoing Trump Administration have suggested that the Biden Administration continue to pursue the framework from late 2020 to lock in Russia's commitment to impose a cap on the size of its stockpile.[147] Others, however, note that this framework should not be binding on the Biden Administration because the two nations had not actually reached an agreement on what would be limited or how to count the limited items.

Those who favor renegotiating, rather than extending, New START believe it would provide the United States with the opportunity to press Russia to include limits on its new types of long-range nuclear delivery systems and to accept limits on shorter-range, nonstrategic delivery vehicles. But this approach envisions a more complicated treaty and could take years to complete the negotiations. Therefore, it may not provide a capable or timely response to the impending expiration of New START. As noted above, Russia has been unwilling to accept limits on its nonstrategic nuclear delivery vehicles in the past, and any attempt to convince Russia to do so in the future may require the United States to agree to the elimination of its nuclear weapons deployed in Europe. Deputy Foreign Minister Ryabkov reiterated this point during an interview in October 2020.[148] Moreover, while limits on nonstrategic nuclear weapons have long been a U.S. priority for the next arms control agreement, Russia has stated that the next agreement should include limits on U.S. ballistic missile defense programs, limits on nonnuclear strategic-range delivery systems (specifically, U.S. sea-launched cruise missiles), and limits on other nations' (specifically British and French) nuclear forces. These demands would likely impede an effort to renegotiate or replace New START before its 2021 expiration, but could be included in a framework for a new agreement to be negotiated after an extension of New START.

Some have also questioned whether the United States should extend New START because they believe it might eventually constrain the ongoing U.S. nuclear modernization program.[149] While the United States plans to recapitalize all three legs of its nuclear triad, each program is sized to fit within the limits of New START. But, with growing concerns about the challenges the United States might face from Russia and China, along with growing concerns about the scope of their nuclear modernization programs, the United States might eventually seek to expand its forces beyond the limits in New START. The 2018 Nuclear Posture Review hints at this possibility by noting that the plan for rebuilding the sea-based leg of the nuclear triad will include at least 12 Columbia-class submarines, thus leaving open the possibility of a larger program.

Nevertheless, based on the pace of modernization, New START may not interfere with the U.S. modernization program, even if the treaty were extended for five years. Most of the new U.S. systems are not scheduled to enter the force until the late 2020s, after New START's 2026 expiration. Moreover, the new systems are to replace existing, older systems, which would keep the U.S. force within the New START limits for many years. Any expansion beyond those limits would not occur until later in the 2030s. On the other hand, if New START were to expire in 2021, the United States might feel compelled to both accelerate and expand its modernization programs if Russia were to expand its nuclear programs when released from the constraints of the treaty.

Prospects for Trilateral Arms Control

U.S. Views

In April 2019, President Trump directed his staff to develop proposals for expanded arms control efforts that include China as a party, noting that the United States should "persuade China to join an arms-control pact limiting or verifying its capabilities for the first time."[150] The Administration has labeled this approach as "21st century arms control" and has argued that it would better serve U.S. national security interests than would the extension of New START.[151] Administration officials did not offer many details about the U.S. goals for these discussions beyond calling for an agreement that would limit all the nuclear weapons deployed by all three nations.[152] Nevertheless, a senior State Department official maintained that it is critical to bring China into the arms control process because "China has enjoyed having both Moscow and Washington constrained by strategic arms control, and it is on track to at least double the size of its arsenal over the next few years."[153] Trump Administration officials have also suggested that China should want to join in the U.S.-Russian arms control process to solidify its status as a great power. As Marshall Billingslea recently argued, "Great power status requires behaving with great power responsibility."[154] A State Department official also recently suggested that the United States would "mobilize world opinion against [China] if they don't negotiate with us."[155]

When the United States and Russia began discussions on strategic stability and the arms control in July 2020, the United States insisted that the China participate in the negotiations. However, as noted below, China has refused to join the talks and Russia has rejected the U.S. suggestion that it pressure China to do so. When the United States and Russia met again in August 2020, the United States seemed willing to begin discussions on a follow-on agreement to New START without China at the table. In his statement following the meeting, Billingslea reiterated the U.S. goal of including China in the arms control negotiations, but indicated that the United States was "not suggesting … that we would amend the New START Treaty to include China." He did, however, indicate that the new U.S.-Russian framework would have to include a path for China to join because "the next treaty will have to be multilateral, it will have to include China."[156]

Some analysts familiar with China's views and the U.S.-Russian arms control process contend that the United States would have difficulty negotiating an agreement with China with limits similar to those mandated by the U.S.-Russian New START Treaty. As noted above, this treaty permits the United States and Russia to deploy 1,550 warheads on their long-range nuclear delivery systems; unclassified estimates contend that China deploys fewer than 150 warheads on systems of a similar range.[157] China might reject a treaty that codified this imbalance; the United States and Russia would likely object to an agreement that either invited China to increase its forces to U.S. and Russian levels or required the U.S. and Russia to reduce their forces to China's level. Consequently, some analysts have suggested that the United States seek a political commitment from China with a pledge to refrain from increasing its nuclear forces while the United States and Russia remain bound by the limits of New START.[158] Alternatively, the United States and China could also pursue bilateral talks where they could share information and concerns about their respective nuclear forces. Such talks could open communications and build confidence between the two governments, while also possibly identifying areas for further cooperation.

Current and former State Department officials have also noted the difficulties with bringing China into the arms control negotiations. Andrea Thompson, the former Under Secretary of State for International Security and Arms Control, recently noted that she raised the issue repeatedly with Chinese officials, and "they were not interested in having a discussion."[159] In December 2019, then-Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Ford sent China an invitation to begin a two-way "strategic security dialogue." China has not responded to this invitation, but the White House apparently believes these talks could serve as a "first step toward an agreement that will cover all U.S., Russian and Chinese nuclear weapons."[160]

Nevertheless, in May 2020 Marshall Billingslea suggested that the United States would be unlikely to extend New START unless China joins the arms control process.[161] He modified this approach in August 2020, when he acknowledged that the United States would not seek to amend New START to include China and that the United States would likely work with Russia to negotiate a "politically binding" framework agreement on a successor agreement. But he also argued that this framework should include a pathway for China to join the discussions and continued to insist that a future treaty would have to include China.[162] Billingslea has noted that China is modernizing its nuclear forces, and that it plans to transform its military into a "first tier force by 2050." Therefore, he stated, a "three-way arms control agreement would provide the best way to avoid an unpredictable three-way arms race." He also argued that Russia should take the initiative to bring China to the negotiating table.[163] In response to questions about why China should participate and what incentives the United States would offer, he noted that China wants to "be afforded great power status" and that the United States is "certainly willing to afford them that respect." He also pointed out that, if China and Russia did not agree to pursue arms control agreements that met the U.S. goals, they could face an arms race with the United States. He said "we know how to spend the adversary into oblivion. If we have to, we will, but we sure would like to avoid it."[164] Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Ford made a similar point in the paper he published in April 2020, when he stated that "we are giving Moscow and Beijing incentives to negotiate seriously with us by being prepared to compete ruthlessly and effectively with them—and to win that competition—if they will not talk."[165]

Russian Views

In his remarks at the Hudson Institute, Special Presidential Envoy Billingslea noted that Russia has agreed with the U.S. suggestion that future arms control agreements include other nuclear-armed nations. Russia's Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov highlighted this point in comments he made shortly before New START entered into force in 2011. At the time, he suggested that further steps in arms control could not occur until the United States and Russia fulfilled their obligations under New START and that, when they did occur, they would have to include other nuclear armed nations.[166] While most observers believed this was a reference to China, Russia, and the Soviet Union before it, have long believed that arms control treaties should also limit British and French nuclear forces because these can reach targets in Russia. Deputy Foreign Minister Sergey Ryabkov confirmed this view in June 2019, when he noted that Russia "sees the need to include all countries" recognized as nuclear weapons states "in such a format." This would mean including "the UK and France, the closest allies of the United States, whose nuclear potentials are an integral element in the overall military planning system, including within the framework of NATO."[167]

Neither France, with around 300 nuclear warheads, nor the United Kingdom, with a force of around 200 warheads, has shown any interest in participating in the U.S.-Russian arms control process. Hence, if the United States believes that a 21st century arms control treaty must include China, and Russia believes it must also include the United Kingdom and France, the prospects of negotiating such a treaty before New START expires, or even as a replacement after New START is extended, seem extremely low.

At the same time, Russian officials have rejected the U.S. view that Russia must work to bring China into the arms control process. In a statement issued in May 2020, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs stated Russia is "ready to support any multilateral initiatives that can enhance international security and stability. However, this must be based on the free will of their potential participants. No country may be coerced into them."[168] Deputy Foreign Minister Ryabkov also rejected the suggestion that Russia bring China to the table, noting that "it is a sovereign right of any nation to join any talks."[169]

Chinese Views

China has long been opposed to participation in formal negotiations to limit or reduce nuclear weapons. The PRC generally argues that the United States and Russia, as the nuclear powers with by far the largest arsenals and the greatest capabilities, should take the first steps toward meaningful arms control.[170] Consistent with this past approach, China rejected the Trump Administration's April 2019 invitation to participate in arms control negotiations with Russia and the United States. At the time, Geng Shuang, a spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, noted that China's "nuclear force is always kept at the minimum level required by national security, with an order-of-magnitude difference from that of the US and Russia."[171] PRC officials reiterated this point on multiple occasions in 2019 and 2020.[172] China has also rejected calls by the United States and others in the international community for it to offer more transparency into the size and structure of its nuclear forces, noting that these measures would only aid its adversaries in planning attacks against those forces.[173]

Chinese Navy's Third Aircraft Carrier Likely to be Launched This Year

Our Bureau 05:57 AM, January 18, 2021 702

The Chinese Navy's large aircraft carrier, Type 003, is expected to be launched in 2021 and enter naval service around 2025.

General outline of the warship is already identifiable in recent openly available photographs. Blocks of the Type 003 aircraft carrier are currently being assembled in Shanghai-based Jiangnan Shipyard.

After all the blocks are put together, the upper structures will be installed. Since the blocks are built in advance, the assembly and the outfitting work will take much less time compared with China's second aircraft carrier, Ordnance Industry Science Technology, a Chinese defense industry magazine, said in a report published in its WeChat account on Saturday.

The current status indicates that the Type 003 could be only a few months away from its launch before the end of 2021. After this the carrier will undertake outfitting work, be installed with equipment including radar and sensor devices, conduct tests and embark on sea trials, which could take about two years, meaning the warship could join naval service in 2024 or 2025, the magazine predicted.

The Chinese media had speculated earlier that the warship could be launched in 2020.

Chinese state broadcaster China Central Television (CCTV) also expects the country's third aircraft carrier to make its public debut in 2021.

"2021 is a year full of expectations, including the Type 003 aircraft carrier and also the H-20 bomber. It is time for our technological development to bear fruit," Song Zhongping, a Chinese military expert and TV commentator, told the Global Times on Sunday.

Type 003 carrier is expected to be as big as U.S. Navy's Kitty Hawk-class, displacing more than 80,000 tons. The magazine said that the ship is likely to be equipped with electromagnetic catapults to launch aircraft, replacing the ski jump method used on current Chinese carriers.

ARGUMENT

Russia's Security Agencies Are Both Terrifying and Incompetent

The ineptitude of the FSB sends a message about how powerful it is.

BY NATALIA ANTONOVA | JANUARY 15, 2021, 12:37 PM

In 2007, the popular Russian rock group DDT released a provocative album that featured, among other things, a song called "At the general's house." The song, written mostly from the point of view of a drunken general at the FSB (the Russian Federal Security Service) surrounded by his stolen wealth, mocked the corruption and cynicism of Russia's security forces. You might think this caused the band problems. But they remain as popular as ever.

That's because everyone in Russia knows that the FSB, and other security agencies, are insanely corrupt—and also often massively incompetent. It's a fact of life under President Vladimir Putin, as mundane as the weather. Russian state media may not like to dwell on it in order to protect its budgets, but Russians don't need the newspapers to tell them something that's already being rubbed in their faces every day.

Western media has written that the FSB's incompetence and inefficiency were "exposed" by the botched poisoning of opposition figure Alexei Navalny. But that incompetence, to Russians, is exactly what they expect from the security state. This isn't to take away from the gravity of the situation around Navalny—what happened was a travesty, even if it did involve poisoned underwear, and a clueless hitman discussing the assassination with Navalny himself on an unsecured line.

The FSB is not unique when it comes to botched assassinations. Take another security agency, the GRU, which attempted to poison another dissident in the UK—and the "chain of stupidity" that resulted in them being exposed.

In Putin's Russia, the security services don't actually need to be professional in order to be considered fearsome. In fact, no officials in Russia need to be professional in order to be feared. Instead, their terrifying reputation comes from a total lack of accountability.

In 2010, I had come to Russia to work as deputy editor of The Moscow News, an English language newspaper that was once a propaganda organ which traced its roots back to the Stalin era. Under my then boss, Tim Wall, the newspaper, while owned by state media agency RIA Novosti, was an editorially independent entity. RIA Novosti itself in those days was also very different from the propagandist cesspool it is today, with actual professionals in key roles, working to make it more like the Russian version of the BBC.

Even so, I was constantly warned about not running my mouth in front of some of the RIA people we worked with. When I became acting editor-in-chief of The Moscow News, I was even pulled aside and told to "watch myself" with some people rumored to be in constant contact with the FSB, reporting to them on all of my activities. The situation didn't so much scare me as irritate me.

I once shared a cigarette with one of the very people I had been warned about, listening to him bitterly complain about how he'd been late for a flight out of Moscow because the border patrol, which is run by the FSB, was slow that day (Russians stamp your passport when you enter and exit the country, and they do that for everybody—it's both an extra layer of security and surveillance).

"It was an outrage! Lines everywhere! But you can't complain, can you? Who do you complain about the FSB to?" ranted the man many of us thought to be an FSB asset himself.

For me, this was an important lesson in how power works in modern Russia. The powerful are powerful precisely because they are allowed to be incompetent. Whether it's a line at the airport, or an official motorcade blocking all of Moscow traffic, or an assassination gone wrong, the message is: "We're going to do what we want, and we don't care. Now watch us."

The powerful are powerful precisely because they are allowed to be incompetent.

In some ways, the incompetence of the armed and powerful in Russia can be even more terrifying than their flashes of competence. Just consider the botched Beslan siege, when Russian special forces stormed a school being held hostage and accidentally killed dozens of people.

In the Navalny case, even an assassination gone wrong can be exploited by the Kremlin for shock value. Yes, it will result in memes and plenty of people making fun of the situation. Yet at the same time, it's not as if the Russian government is going to be brought down by memes, and the leaders know that. As a Russian official told me off the record once, the memefication of the security services' screw-ups can actually be convenient, as it humanizes the participants.

In the UK case, when the men calling themselves "Petrov" and "Boshirov" sat down for a television interview in which they argued that they were innocent tourists and not GRU assassins, viewers couldn't help but cringe on their behalf.

The horror of what happened—and the fact that a woman died as the direct result of their actions—was lost in the carnival atmosphere that dominated the media coverage. "Petrov" and "Boshirov" came off as so fake and pathetic during the interview that plenty of Russians wound up feeling sorry for them.

A similar situation occurred with the FSB's Navalny poisoners. One of my favorite Russian writers, the playwright and satirist Valery Pecheykin, summed this up well in a Facebook post where he talked about the depressing states of the stairwells in buildings where both FSB hitmen and Russian dissidents live, with walls "green like ennui, like a phone call at 7 a.m., but also green like the spring." Pecheykin's posts capture both the absurdity and glacial stagnation of late Putinism—the government and its minions are a joke, the joke has been told over and over again, the joke is old, the joke is stale, and that too is part of its power.

Just like in DDT's song about the FSB general, there is a heart of darkness buried underneath the absurdity. By their actions, incompetent Russian assassins demonstrate that the government doesn't need to try. It just needs to exist.

When the narrator of the song asks the general how he wound up owning a palace, the general is first angry, then resigned. "Oh, son…" he says.

The weary paternalism of the general's words doesn't stop him from trying to mock-execute the narrator by dawn, after a night of drinking. If that's not a metaphor for the Russian security state as a whole, I don't know what is.

IV. Conclusion: Is "Forward Defense" A Sustainable Military Doctrine? 20

I. Executive Summary

On January 2, 2020, the United States assassinated the commander of the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps' Qods Force, General Qassem Soleimani, in Iraq and accused him of playing a role in an alleged attack on American troops by Iran-backed Shia militias. The assassination signaled a major escalation in the conflict between Iran and the United States. For a moment, the conflict ceased to be a proxy war characterized by efforts to keep tensions deniable and indirect and instead became a direct exchange of violence, with Iran responding to the assassination with a direct missile strike on U.S. forces.

The fallout of the assassination reflects the contradictions and uncertainty at the heart of Iranian proxy warfare strategy and its approach known as "forward defense,"[1] in which Iran seeks to use proxies in other countries to prevent conflict from coming within Iran's borders. Iran's strategy was developed over decades through its confrontations with the United States and regional rivals and historically has emphasized its willingness to eschew revisionist religious and ideological aims in order to pursue national interests.

The 2011 Arab Spring, with its threat to Iran's key partner in Syria while opening opportunities in other areas, inaugurated a more uncertain era for Iran's proxy strategy. This uncertainty has been heightened by an increasingly aggressive U.S. stance towards Iran. As a result, Iran has played up appeals to religious and ideological aims alongside more traditional forms of proxy mobilization in its forward defense strategy.

Though Iran continues to view and portray itself as pursuing defensive ends vis-à-vis the United States and other rivals, the means it uses tend to signal more revisionist aims, an issue Iranian policymakers recognize as a challenge but embraced anyways. In turn, this has encouraged the United States, and some of its partners, to pursue their own more direct policies of maximum pressure with regard to Iran.

It is far from clear whether Iran can sustainably pursue this strategy. Iran has a history of agile use of proxies and relatively successful navigation between the mobilization of religious and ideological appeals and the pursuit of national interest. However, Iranian society is showing signs of concern regarding the limits of forward defense. Iran's rivals appear to have assessed that those strains are sufficient and that Iran will fold when confronted.

What is clear, however, is that this uncertainty brings with it the risk of repeated crises with the potential for escalation. Understanding whether and how stability in the relationship can be reasserted will require detailed examinations of the specific balances of national interest, ideological appeals, and Iranian control in the varied national contexts where the conflict is now playing out.

Key Findings:

- The 2011 Arab Spring and 2014 war against ISIS (Islamic State of Iraq and Syria) inaugurated a period of greater Iranian aggressiveness in its use of proxy warfare as it confronted a number of crises that increased Iranian threat perceptions.

- Iranian proxy warfare strategy is shaped by a desire to minimize costs to Iran and its people. As a result, it historically sought to maintain plausible deniability. Iran limited its direct contribution to the defense of the Assad regime in Syria, and has staffed its involvement in proxy wars generally from Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) volunteers and by mobilizing local or foreign proxies, not by mobilizing the nation's more general armed forces. Iranian strategists tout the limitations on direct intervention as a success of the strategy.

- While Iran has embraced more aggressive means in the form of a Forward Defense doctrine that seeks to give Iran strategic depth, it still views its objectives as largely defensive. Iran views itself as facing an American threat to its homeland—escalated by the Trump administration's maximum pressure campaign—as well as an American threat to a key partner in Assad's Syria, and an ISIS threat to Iranian partners and interests in Iraq.

- However, using proxy forces to wage war on the cheap and as a public deterrent has led Iran to rely upon ideological and religious appeals in order to mobilize fighters and signal its capabilities. In recent years, Iran has grown increasingly bold in making public statements that link together the movements it supports and its influence over their activities.

- Iran's strategy contains a tension between its proclaimed defensive ends and its offensive means that have signaled a more revisionist intent to Iranian rivals. This tension holds the potential to escalate conflicts and thus make Iran's strategy unsustainable given its desire to minimize costs. Iranian strategists are aware of the tension but supporters of the forward defense strategy view it as a manageable tension given its history of proxy warfare.

- Iran's proxy strategy faces real political limits to its sustainability rooted in both domestic anger at the use of funds abroad, economic constraints, and backlash against perceived Iranian domination in countries where Iran seeks to build partners.

- The United States, for its part, has embraced a strategy of maximum pressure that views Iran's strategy as unsustainable and prone to failure when conflict takes on a more direct character. Through sanctions and direct assassinations of key IRGC personnel, the United States hopes to force Iran to back down.

- It is not clear if Iran's strategy is actually built to last, but the current moment is likely to be characterized by repeated crises with the potential to escalate into more direct confrontations because Iranian strategists view forward defense as an effective approach agile enough to manage tensions and the United States views it as an unsustainable policy that will fall apart when confronted.

- Policymakers should be aware of the ways in which Iran's methods of ensuring cost-effective mobilization when pressed shape threat perceptions across the region, the IRGC's own structure, and Iranian domestic politics. The effects of particular policies are likely to be complex and often unpredictable given the way transnational mobilization and signals interlink conflicts.

- An effective approach to this moment of crisis instability will require analysis of the sustainability of specific Iranian interventions. In some cases, like Iran's support for Hezbollah, ideological and material ties make it unlikely that pressure can disrupt an established proxy relationship. In others, like Yemen, Iran's commitment to the Houthis is more vulnerable to pressure. Other cases, like the Shi'a militias in Iraq, are less clear.

II. Introduction

The U.S. assassination of Gen. Qassem Soleimani on January 2, 2020 in Baghdad was so unprecedented that many feared that any move afterward might lead to all-out war between the United States and the Islamic Republic of Iran. After four decades of tense rivalry in the Middle East, the American use of an armed drone to target a military official widely viewed as one of the most powerful men in Iran signaled a precipitous climb up the escalation ladder between Washington and Tehran. Iran in turn retaliated on January 8 with direct missile strikes on American forces in Iraq, although the strikes did not kill anyone.[2] By one account, the Iranians had given the U.S. military an eight-hour notice to clear the bases before the missiles hit. Amir Ali Hajizadeh, head of the Revolutionary Guards' Aerospace Force, claimed that the warning had been given to the Americans because Tehran "did not intend to kill [persons]."[3] Tehran wanted both to show a capacity to strike at the United States but also to demonstrate that it had no intentions to see the military standoff escalate further.

For now, despite the missile strike, Iran appears prepared to double down on the proxy war strategy that was Soleimani's most significant contribution to Tehran's anti-access, area denial approach to deterring American attempts to expand U.S. regional influence that could seed regime change in Tehran.

Over the course of the last decade, this Iranian approach to regional military operations began to be described by its proponents in Tehran as "forward defense." Put simply, forward defense holds that militarily confronting enemies outside of Iran's borders is preferable to having to face them inside of Iran's borders. At its core, forward defense is the embodiment of Iran's military lessons gained over the four decades since the Iranian Revolution of 1979. It reflects a fusion of the tools available to Iranian military leaders combined with the need to address a fast-changing security environment.

While Soleimani was one of the principal creators of the concept, his death will not be the end of the strategy. That has been the message sent by Iran's Supreme Leader and Commander-in-Chief, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Khamenei swiftly appointed Soleimani's successor, Esmail Ghaani, as head of the Qods Force, the branch of the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps (IRGC) that operates outside of Iran's borders. Khamenei has also been categorical that the mission of the Qods Force as intended by Soleimani will continue. As he put it, "The strategy of the Qods Force will be identical to that during the time of Martyr General Soleimani."[4]

In a speech on May 22, 2020 set to coincide with Al Qods Day, which is an event to express opposition to the State of Israel, Khamenei was unusually polemical and signaled his determination to stay the course. In urging the expansion of "jihad inside Palestinian territories [Israel]," he not only praised groups such as Lebanon's Hezbollah, the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, and Hamas but vowed that Iran would stand by them on the path of "holy struggle."[5] Iranian officials even set aside the usual application of deniability. In a rare move, state-run media publicized the fact that Soleimani had spearheaded the transfer of Iranian weaponry to Palestinian militants.[6] Such statements from Tehran are a rebuff of American and Israeli demands that Tehran roll back its support for militant Islamist groups in various theaters in the Middle East.

In pursuing this strategy in the post-Arab Spring era, Iran has increasingly come to embrace aggressive means that involve transnational mobilization and the interlinking of proxy forces, which has in turn encouraged the United States and other Iranian rivals to perceive Iran's strategy as an offensive and revisionist one.

Soleimani's assassination, increased tensions vis-à-vis the United States, and the fluidity of the geopolitics of the Middle East, have brought into the open questions in Iran about the long-term costs, benefits, and risks of a forward defense strategy that relies on Tehran's ability to continue to defy the growing pressures on its economy from U.S. sanctions and fund proxy groups. In the same week as hardliners around Khamenei were touting Tehran's commitment to militant revolutionary foreign policy, a prominent parliamentarian launched a rare public criticism of Tehran's regional agenda.

Heshmatollah Falahatpisheh,[7] who until recently had been head of the Iranian parliament's committee on national security and foreign policy, asked for Iran to reassess its commitment to the Bashar Al Assad regime in Syria. "[Iran] has probably given 20 to 30 billion dollars to Syria and must recover it. The money belonging to this nation [Iran] has been spent there," he said.[8] The reference to funds invested in backing Syria's Assad was a clear attack on Tehran's foreign policy priorities or that was at least how Khamenei loyalists viewed it. Hossein Shariatmadari, the Khamenei-appointed editor of Kayhan, the Islamic Republic's equivalent to the Soviet Pravda, denounced Falahatpisheh as doing Trump's bidding by turning Iranian public opinion against Tehran's foreign policy.[9] The incident was a peek into the opaque policy-making process in Tehran and evidence of competing viewpoints in Tehran in regard to the cost of Iran's regional efforts and whether it is sustainable.

The question now for the Biden administration and Congress as well as for their counterparts in Iran is whether Iranian proxy war strategy is truly built to last. The Trump administration turned the calculus of indirect confrontation with Iran on its head, evidently deciding that the United States either no longer needs or can no longer afford the risks that come with fighting Iran's proxies in the shadows. Despite the Trump administration's repeated public pronouncements that it wanted to reduce the U.S. footprint in the Middle East and discontinue its perceived role as regional policeman, the White House opted to put on display American hard power as a way of forcing the Iranians capitulate to a campaign of "maximum pressure" aimed at forcing Iran to recalibrate its approach to Iraq, Syria, and Israel. This new U.S. approach essentially destroyed the crisis stability that was part and parcel of a covert action strategy anchored in plausible deniability. The high-profile assassination of Soleimani was the most overt expression of this new policy. At the same time, Iran has increasingly adopted public, aggressive means in pursuit of its forward defense strategy.

In the short term, this fresh American resolve will have to contend with one simple reality: Iran's ongoing determination and ability to mobilize, guide, and launch a host of militant groups across the Middle East that Tehran has painstakingly cultivated for decades. In fact, Soleimani and other architects of Iran's forward defense, proxy war strategy would argue that this turn in American policy has been long awaited, and that Iran and its allies are ready for the challenge.

Yet, while Tehran's ability to mobilize an array of foreign militias under its flag is no small feat, the contention that Iran can stay the course regardless of American counter-actions is an untested theory as is the hope of some U.S. policymakers that U.S. pressure can effectively rollback Iranian footprint across the region. Evaluating where, when, and why Iran's forward defense strategy has worked and where it is built on a sustainable foundation and understanding where it has failed and lacks a sustainable foundation, will be central to determining the effectiveness of both U.S. and Iranian crisis management. In the meantime, the uncertainty will likely bring with it periodic crises that at least appear to hold the potential for further escalation to more direct confrontations.

The rest of this report is divided into three sections. The first section examines the historical development of Iran's proxy warfare strategy under Soleimani. The second section examines the sustainability of the strategy today, and the third and concluding section draws lessons from the clash between Iranian proxy strategy and America's new hard power approach.

III. Soleimani Ascendant: The Origins of Iran's "Forward Defense" Strategy

The geopolitical feud between Iran and the United States dates to 1979 when Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and his militant Islamist supporters overthrew the Shah of Iran and soon after took control of the U.S. embassy. Though many historians have assessed that the CIA-backed coup that led to the ouster of Iran's Prime Minister Mohammed Mossadegh in 1953 planted the initial seeds of mistrust between the United States and the Iranian people, it was Khomeini's rise to power that earned the United States its most-hated-nation status in Iran among anti-Shah forces. Following the hostage crisis at the U.S. embassy in Tehran in November 1979, Washington responded in kind, casting the Khomeinists as the source of nearly all wrongdoing in the Middle East.[10]

For nearly half a century, the U.S.-Iran conflict was largely characterized by mutual restraint. Neither Washington nor Tehran judged an open military conflict to be in their interests. Instead, a kind of crisis stability anchored in a proxy war paradigm of covert action shaped the normative bounds of American and Iranian strategy. Hit and run attacks on American targets by Hezbollah in Lebanon in the 1980s and later by proxy elements currently allied with the Popular Mobilization Forces or the PMF in Iraq punctuated by American-backed counterattacks in the form of cyber-strikes and targeted assassinations of nuclear scientists on the streets of Tehran have long been part of the backdrop. Each element of this tit-for-tat proxy war between Washington and Tehran always rested on one simple element: plausible deniability.[11]

The Iran-Iraq War, Soleimani, and Iran's Geopolitical Approach to Proxy Warfare

Iran's proxy warfare strategy of using regional non-state militant groups paralleled Qassem Soleimani's rise as a military commander during the 1990s on the heels of the Iran-Iraq war. Born in 1957, Soleimani came from a poor family in the central province of Kerman. As a teenager he became an anti-Shah Islamist activist before the revolution of 1979 but he did not stand out at that time.[12] The revolution began and prevailed in Tehran but droves of young men—mostly from impoverished rural backgrounds—jumped on the bandwagon. Soleimani was one of them. While he had no formal military training, his chance in life came at the outbreak of the Iran-Iraq War (1980-1988). He enlisted as a volunteer with the Guards and quickly moved up through the ranks of the IRGC, the group of ragtag, armed young men that were empowered and mandated by Ayatollah Khomeini to defend the Islamic Republic against all domestic and foreign enemies.

In late 1980, a few months after the war with Iraq had begun, the 23-year Soleimani was given the command of a volunteer force from his home province of Kerman in what became the 41st Sarallah Division.[13] This newly formed division was deployed to Iran's Kurdistan province, an area both known for heavy ethnic Kurdish separatist militancy but also as a staging ground into Iraq. On the other side of the border was Iraqi Kurdistan where Tehran, from the days of the Shah, had cultivated anti-Saddam Iraqi Kurds as allies against Baghdad.[14] It is here that Soleimani experienced first-hand the utility of co-opting and deploying foreign militants as part of military strategizing.[15]

Ideological or religious reasons were, at best, secondary drivers at this point. The ideological and religious-based reasoning that later came to dominate the narrative to justify forward defense had yet to be born. Nonetheless, it is during the first years of the Iran-Iraq War, which began in September 1980, that the Qods Force, the expeditionary branch of the IRGC, was born, although its mission would evolve over time.[16] Its actions were centered on cross-border operations along the Iran-Iraq battle lines and on recruiting Iraqis.[17] Mostafa Chamran, an Iranian Islamist revolutionary who had seen military training with Shia militants in Lebanon in the 1970s, was a key driver behind the adoption of asymmetric warfare tactics and became the Islamic Republic's first defense minister.[18] While Soleimani was not a key player in the formation of this new outfit, he would be a key participant in the application of the new approach, which mirrored the missions of special operations forces in countries like the United States, including covert action and reconnaissance behind enemy lines.[19] In time, what would make the Qods Force stand out was its use of Shia Islamist rallying cries and its recruitment among Shias outside of Iran.

The Qods Force's mission was not centered on exploiting religious or sectarian fervor at first. The Iraqi Kurds that Iranian commanders like Soleimani collaborated with were not Shia but secular Sunnis. Iranian support for them was an early signal of the Islamic Republic's willingness to collaborate with an assortment of non-Shia or non-Islamist actors as long as the partnership advanced Iran's perceived geopolitical interests. In a decade's time, Iran would be militarily supporting a range of Sunni groups deemed as important to Islamic Republic national interests including the Sunni Afghan Northern Alliance in Afghanistan to the Sunni Bosnians[20] in the Yugoslav civil war to the Sunni Hamas in Gaza.[21] As Zalmay Khalilzad put it in regards to Iran's modus operandi in Afghanistan during the 1990s, being Shia "was not sufficient to gain Iranian support."[22] This was also evident in Iran's support for Christian Armenia against Shia Muslim Azerbaijan in the war between the two countries over the disputed territory of Nagorno-Karabakh in the early 1990s.[23]

In all of its efforts involving military partners and operations outside of Iran, certain characteristics stand out. Tehran always performed a careful cost-benefit analysis and, as David Menashri argues, it "diligently sought out opportunities in areas, or in movements, that seemed ripe to respond" to its ideological overtures.[24] The Shia Islamist Iraqis, many of whom moved to Iran to fight Saddam Hussain's regime under Ayatollah Khomeini's spiritual and political leadership during the Iran-Iraq war, were one such group. It was during the early 1980s that some of the most prominent present-day Iraqi militia leaders—men such as Hadi Ameri and Abu Mahdi Al Muhandis, who was killed alongside Soleimani in January—launched their collaboration with their sponsors in the IRGC.[25]

The Badr Corps, composed of Shia Iraqi Islamists who looked to Iran, began as a brigade and remained under tight IRGC control. This oversight angered Mohammad Baqir Al-Hakim, the Iraqi Shia cleric who headed the political wing of the Badr movement.[26] He complained to the then President Ali Khamenei and Speaker of the Majlis, Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani. Still, the senior IRGC commanders backed by the political leadership in Tehran were determined to maintain strict Iranian control of the foreign forces they were arming and funding. The dispute over command-and-control was somehow resolved and the relationship continued.[27] Since the dispute, however, Iran has continued to have lingering doubts about its ability to effectively organize and control its foreign proxies as it sees fit.

Soleimani held the post of commander of the 41st Sarallah Division throughout the Iran-Iraq War. He was one of the youngest military commanders but never a specially celebrated one during the war and his fame would only come years later in the 2000s as he began to cultivate a public image.[28] The one factor that appears to have counted in his favor is that he developed a personal bond with the then President Ali Khamenei who frequently visited the war front. The future supreme leader, who took over after Khomeini's death in June 1989, never forgot that Soleimani had kept him in the highest esteem when many other IRGC commanders viewed Khamenei suspiciously throughout his presidency (1981-1989).[29]

It was precisely this close personal bond between Khamenei and Soleimani that many analysts have considered as pivotal to the rise and relative independence of the Qods Force during Soleimani's command from 1998 until his death in 2020. Soleimani's death thus raised questions about whether the organization would maintain its stature within the power structures of the Islamic Republic without Soleimani at the helm.

Lessons from a Neighbor Under Siege: Soleimani's First Forays in Afghanistan

After the Iran-Iraq War, Soleimani was given the mission of dealing with rampant organized crime, including arms and drug trafficking coming out of Afghanistan, a country ravaged by civil war where a new breed of extremist movement under the banner of the Taliban was on the rise. Tehran viewed the movement not only as anti-Iran and anti-Shia but as a creation of its regional rivals, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates.[30]

In early 1998, as Iran was still recovering from the devastation wrought by the eight-year war with Saddam Hussein's Iraq, Soleimani was named head of the Qods Force.[31] At the time, Soleimani was barely known to the Iranian public, but he was a known figure among warring factions in neighboring Afghanistan where he had served as Iran's key military liaison to anti-Taliban forces in the Northern Alliance.[32] Little analysis has been conducted in the English language about Soleimani's efforts to aid and guide Northern Alliance forces then under the leadership of Ahmad Shah Massoud, a Sunni and ethnic Tajik leader who was among the top opponents of the Taliban.[33] What is known is that Soleimani had been in his new role less than a year when Taliban forces in August of 1998 captured the northern Afghan city of Mazar-i Sharif and promptly arrested nine diplomats at the Iranian consulate.

The Taliban forces, after they had by one account received instructions from Pakistan's ISI (Inter-Service Intelligence), killed all the Iranians except one who managed to escape.[34] Tehran made a show out of its response, mobilizing tens of thousands of troops on the border ready to go into Afghanistan. Still, after lengthy deliberation, Iran's Supreme National Security Council (SNSC) opted against a conventional military retaliation against the Taliban, in part fearing being drawn into a quagmire.[35] Instead, under the auspices of the Qods Force, Tehran increased its financial and military support for its anti-Taliban partners like Ahmad Shah Massoud.[36] Tehran not only welcomed but actively sought to assist the U.S. military campaign against the Taliban in 2001 following the terrorist attacks of September 11.[37]

Soleimani's close links with the Northern Alliance would prove enduring and critical for bolstering his assertions about the value of proxy relations for maintaining a forward defense and deterrent against potential aggression or overreach by adversaries. This kind of patronage also gave Iran leverage not just in the military theater but also on the political and diplomatic stages. Foreign Minister Javad Zarif has claimed that the December 2001 Bonn conference that led to Afghanistan's first post-Taliban government could not have succeeded without Soleimani's mediation and ability to pressure the various Afghan political groups that he had cultivated ties with throughout the 1990s.[38]

During the Afghan civil war of the 1990s, the Qods Force and its top commanders, including Soleimani but also Esmail Ghaani, proved to the political leadership in Tehran that the supply of arms and funds to Afghan militants had not only given Iran a say in the battlefield but also had given Tehran a role as a principal powerbroker in that country. This gave Soleimani much personal confidence, which he soon put on public display. By 2008, Soleimani famously sent a message to the top U.S. military official in Iraq: "General Petraeus, you should know that I, Qassem Soleimani, control the policy for Iran with respect to Iraq, Lebanon, Gaza, and Afghanistan."[39]

The War on Terror and the Arab Spring Years: Iran's Efforts to Consolidate Forward Defense in Lebanon, Iraq, Syria, and Yemen

The U.S. invasion of Afghanistan in 2001 and then Iraq in 2003 prompted a period of reorganization and consolidation of Iran's military expeditionary forces under the Qods Force. Not only did Soleimani have direct access to Khamenei, which meant he could bypass the rest of the IRGC bosses, but the leadership in Tehran had never had more reason to invest in forward defense. In early 2002, the Bush administration named Iran, along with Iraq and North Korea, as part of an "Axis of Evil." It was not unreasonable for the Iranians to think they might be next in a broader U.S. military campaign in the Middle East following 9/11. Keeping the Americans bogged down elsewhere in the region presented an attractive strategy for Tehran. Despite the risk it took in angering Washington, the strategy was worthwhile if it meant preventing or stalling a possible American attack on the Iranian homeland.

The newly reenergized Qods Force reflected hard lessons learned from several different phases of strategic realignment. From support for Hezbollah in Lebanon beginning in the 1980s to backing for the Northern Alliance in Afghanistan in the 1990s and various groups in Iraq and Yemen in the 2000s, Soleimani's way of war led to mixed results. Yet, each case allowed Qods Force commanders to adapt and refine their proxy war strategy, and modulate the response to increasing American pressure in the form of covert counter attacks and sanctions. Meanwhile, Soleimani significantly elevated the degree of freedom of operation provided to Qods Force commanders.

As part of the Qods Force organizational structure, each region of operation is given to an individual commander. This "One Country, One File, One Commander" was Soleimani's brainchild and gives individual Qods Force commanders extraordinary freedom to design and implement policy; but it also makes them responsible for the outcome, according to Morad Veisi, a journalist with Radio Farda, the Iranian branch of the United States' Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty and an expert on the IRGC.[40] In those most delicate theaters where the Qods Force required maximum policy control, its officers have often been the ones Tehran has dispatched as its top diplomatic envoys. In the case of Iraq, all three of Iran's ambassadors to Baghdad since 2003 have come from the Qods Force.[41]

To the Qods Force leaders in Tehran, Iran's support to a long list of militant groups across the Middle East translates into leverage. These groups are seen as a vindication of the mobilization and financing of the so-called forward defense. The militant groups help to project Iranian military reach and, at times, ideological influence. While Iran's consolidation of a forward defense strategy was driven by overarching regional dynamics including a growing perception of a U.S. threat and the rise of new opportunities and challenges with the Arab Spring, its character varied across different national contexts. This was so despite growing public references to transnational mobilization and connections between groups.

Hezbollah in Lebanon: An Enduring, Ideologically Close Relationship with Geopolitical Value

Hezbollah in Lebanon is the best example of Iran's forward defense concept.[42] This should not be surprising. Iran's own IRGC began as a militia in the aftermath of the Iranian revolution in 1979 and, 41 years later, it is the most formidable political-military-economic actor in the country. This IRGC has diligently worked to replicate its success domestically and turn its foreign proxies into powerbrokers in their respective home countries.

In the case of Hezbollah in Lebanon, the IRGC and its Qods Force foreign branch did not only ideologically indoctrinate and arm the group, but selected and groomed its leaders, including Hassan Nasrallah, its present leader, and Imad Mughniyeh, the group's top military planner who was assassinated in a joint American-Israeli operation in 2008.[43]

Hezbollah's nearly four-decade alliance with the Islamic Republic is the ultimate successful embodiment of the application of forward defense. Unlike many of the other groups that Tehran has backed since 1979, Hezbollah not only shares the Shia Islamist ideological model adopted in Tehran but provides Iran with a platform from which to militarily exert pressure on its top regional nemesis, Israel. From Tehran's perspective, Hezbollah represents the best the forward defense model can offer: an effective tool of national interest combined with a close and enduring relationship strengthened by both material and ideological ties.

Iran in Syria and Iraq: Key Geopolitical Partner, Contested Ties, and the Role of Ideological and Transnational Mobilization as Stopgap

Yet Iran's military interventions in Syria since the outbreak of the Arab Spring in 2011 demonstrate that ideological conformity is not a prerequisite for Tehran's support. Hezbollah may be a particularly successful case of forward defense, but it is far from the only model for the strategy, which often relies on proxies whose ideological ties to Iran are often far weaker than those of Hezbollah. The Syrian case also illustrates the limits and risks of Iran's pursuit of proxy warfare reliant upon relationships of a less enduring and ideologically bound character.

The Islamic Republic has nothing in common in terms of creed with the secular Baathist regime of Bashar Al Assad.[44] Despite this, Iran intervened militarily on behalf of Assad in close partnership with its ideological offspring, Hezbollah.

Iran's Syrian intervention demonstrated its versatility. It also showed Iran's ability to compartmentalize its regional ambitions and work with foreign partners while awkwardly attempting to publicly cast the mission in Islamist clothing. Iran's key objective was to save a geopolitical ally with a secular system while minimizing costs to Iran itself.[45] Notably, Iran's primary foreign cohort in the mission in Syria has been Vladimir Putin's Russian Federation, hardly a vanguard of Islamism.[46]

The biggest departure in Syria, when compared to the situation in Iraq, was the need for Iran to bring in droves of non-locals—such as Iraqis, Afghans, Pakistanis—to fight under Iranian leadership to keep the Assad regime from collapse.[47] Unlike in Shia-majority Iraq, where the indoctrination of a generation of pro-Islamic Republic sympathizers had been under way before Saddam's fall, Syria's sectarian realities meant that the manpower shortage was a problem for Tehran. This also differentiated Syria from Lebanon, where Iran could rely upon a close ideological ally in Hezbollah. The Qods Force proved agile in circumventing this impediment. In doing so, it sharpened the essence of what forward defense means in practical terms in the post-Arab Spring Middle East by drawing upon transnational networks to resolve the challenges of proxy warfare in a particular context.

The manifestation of forward defense in Iraq and in Syria, since 2003 and 2012 respectively, highlights two basic facts. First, Iran has demonstrated agility in defining and implementing security policy in the region. Second, Iran's activities in Iraq and Syria reveal a consensus among Iranian policy-makers that the appetite of the Iranian public for forward defense is finite.

Tehran did not engage in large-scale recruitment of Iranians to be dispatched to Syria. The few thousand Iranians sent to Syria, ostensibly as military advisors, were overwhelmingly drawn from volunteers in the ranks of the IRGC and not the conscripted Iranian army.[48] Iran thus depended upon its ability to appeal to and recruit among non-Iranian Shia in the region in order to mobilize the transnational networks.[49] While national interest was the primary motivator for Iran's defense of Syria, the limits imposed by Iranian society required an emphasis upon sectarian and religious appeals in the means of accomplishing those goals.

The mobilization of non-Iranian forces was a double-edged sword. It helped resolve Iran's manpower problems. But in strengthening appeals to transnational ideological claims, Iran provided its regional rivals with a convincing argument that Tehran was indoctrinating, funding, and arming a new generation of Shia militants and hence, fueling a regional Shia-Sunni sectarian divide. Iran, a non-

Arab and Shia majority country with aspirations to lead the Islamic world, has always been highly sensitive to the charge of acting as a Shia sectarian power and it has invested heavily in countering this complaint levelled against it. However, the priority of keeping Assad in power superseded Tehran's wish to maintain its credibility in the eyes of the Sunni street.[50] As a result, Iran's approach helped mobilize opposition to Iranian policy and stoked fears that Iran was seeking more revisionist aims.

The IRGC bosses were undeterred and unapologetic. In August 2012, as Tehran's military intervention in Syria became increasingly public, then-IRGC Deputy Commander Brigadier General Hossein Salami said "our doctrines are defensive at the level of (grand) strategy, but our strategies and tactics are offensive."[51] IRGC commanders proudly defended the ability to practice "deep-attack doctrine."[52] In April 2019, Khamenei appointed Salami to become the head of the IRGC, and Soleimani's nominal boss, even as Soleimani retained his direct and much publicized access to the Supreme Leader.[53] Meanwhile, Khamenei's support for forward defense became increasingly overt. "We mustn't be satisfied with our region. By remaining within our borders, we shouldn't neglect the threats over our borders. A broad overseas vision, which is the IRGC's responsibility, is our strategic depth and it is of the utmost importance," he told the IRGC bosses.[54]

Support for the Houthis in Yemen: Loose Ties and a Low Level of Interest

Iran's role in the Yemeni civil war starting in 2014 demonstrates both the limitations of forward defense war and how Tehran has been selective and careful in applying the strategy. It is commonplace to read that Tehran is the sponsor of the Yemeni Houthi rebels fighting the UN-recognized Yemeni government. In reality, when the last round of conflict began in Yemen in 2014, few Iranians were familiar with the term "Houthis" or "Ansar-Allah," the official name of the group. The lack of historic ties between Tehran and the Houthi movement and an exaggerated sense of the importance of sectarian bonds between the two only underscore that their relationship has mostly been a marriage of convenience.[55]

Neither Soleimani nor any other senior IRGC commander ever made a public appearance in Yemen. This stands in contrast to prominent public visits to Lebanon, Afghanistan, Iraq, and Syria.[56] Tehran has not made extensive efforts to spread its religious ideology among the Houthis, who are mostly followers of the Zaidi sect in Islam.[57] The export of Khomeinism to the Houthis of Yemen has happened, but only in small doses as compared to Iraq or Lebanon. Yemen is, from Tehran's perspective, too far-flung, too fractured, and unripe to be a good host for Iran's forward defense doctrine.[58]

Iran has compared the Houthis to Hezbollah in Lebanon.[59] If the latter could be a spear aimed at Israel, the Houthis could be Tehran's pawn against the Saudis. Ali Shirazi, Supreme Leader Khamenei's representative to the Qods force, expressed such a view to the Iranian press in January 2015 and on other occasions.[60] But Yemen was never a core priority for Tehran and the Houthis were never as submissive to Tehran as Hezbollah or the pro-Iran Shia Iraqi groups. Instead, the dynamic in the Iran-Houthi partnership has depended overwhelmingly on the policy decisions of third-party actors, most notably Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and the United States.[61] For example, since late 2019, when the Houthis began the latest round of peace talks with the Saudis and the Americans in Oman, the Iranians were effectively sidelined. The Houthi-Saudi peace talks began shortly after Iran's Ayatollah Khamenei received a senior Houthi delegation in August.[62] Either Tehran was urging the Houthis to sue for peace or it had little influence over their strategic decisions (or both). Even in Washington a new message began to be disseminated that downplayed the closeness of Tehran and the Houthis.[63]

Nevertheless, the Houthis continue to provide Iran with a possible staging-ground from Yemen should Tehran opt to pursue a more militant posture against Riyadh, including via the use of Houthi-controlled Yemeni territory as a launchpad for Iranian-supplied missile strikes. The case of Iran's relations with the Houthis shows that when examining the extent and appeal of the Iranian proxy model of forward defense, it is critical to look for the depth in relations, which is an indicator of Tehran's ability to consolidate its regional alliance against the United States and its allies under the banner of the "Axis of Resistance."

IV. Conclusion: Is "Forward Defense" A Sustainable Military Doctrine?

Iran's forward defense doctrine draws on a long history, including a critical period of consolidation over the 2000s and 2010s. However, as the United States increasingly perceives direct challenges to Iranian proxy actions as a workable strategy, it is far from clear if the doctrine will prove sustainable over the 2020s.

Kayhan Barzegar, a prominent analyst in Tehran on Iranian regional policies, describes Tehran's logic behind forward defense as "preempting the penetration of symmetric and asymmetric threats inside Iran's borders."[64] According to this line of thinking, Iran not only has to secure its national borders but in certain circumstances it has to go outside of its borders as part of a preemptive national security strategy.

Barzegar calls this the concept of "wider security zone," which he argues is part of the "the strategic calculus employed by Iranian political-security elites."[65] The mastermind behind the concept was Soleimani and, at its core, the logic holds that socio-political turmoil in the region, including the emergence of new security threats such as ISIS, requires an increased and active Iranian response, according to Barzegar.[66] Others are less certain about the soundness of such logic. Patrick Clawson, director of research at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, argues the notion of "Soleimani the savior" is highly ironic. According to him, "the Islamic State's victories in Iraq [after 2014] were largely due to the ultra-sectarian policies he pressed on authorities in Baghdad." As Clawson puts it, Iran and Soleimani have been both the "fireman and the arsonist," in regard to conflicts in Iraq and Syria.[67]

What Barzegar calls the application of power in Iran's wider security zone is merely the latest reincarnation of forward defense. As described above, this concept has evolved over the last 40 years since Iran's practical military needs during the Iran-Iraq War. It was then that young IRGC commanders like Soleimani looked for ways to overcome Iran's limitations given Tehran's isolation and lack of access to conventional military platforms.[68] Today, the proxy model still reflects Iran's military weak points but it has also proven its utility.

Since the beginning of the Arab uprisings in 2011, the generals in the IRGC have argued that the shifting regional security environment requires Iran's military strategy to adapt and reinvent itself. When ISIS carried out its first attacks in Tehran in June 2017, the proponents of forward defense wasted no time in arguing that had Iran not militarily intervened in Syria and Iraq, Iran would have had to confront a far greater ISIS threat inside its borders.[69] By implication, since the Iranians officially maintain that the United States has been an enabler for the rise of ISIS, Tehran's rhetorical stance was that fighting ISIS is tantamount to aborting American plans aimed at Iran. As Khamenei put it a few months before the ISIS attacks in Tehran, "there are well-documented news of American aid to ISIS and some other terrorist groups, and now that they [the Americans] have formed an anti-ISIS coalition, some U.S. agencies are still assisting ISIS in other ways."[70] With the United States at the heart of Iran's security calculations, this sort of logic is pervasive in Tehran. Put simply, the fight against ISIS as leverage against the United States is a common theme in the messaging of Iran's leaders. The Revolutionary Guards Commander, Hossein Salami, explained in September 2019: "In war, the victor is the one that can shape the power equation. No power in the world today, including the United States, has the capacity to wage war against the Iranian people."[71] Nonetheless, Iranian academics, including those linked to the Foreign Ministry in Tehran, openly publish works admitting that Iran's rivals do not see Tehran's military posture as defensive.[72] By implication, this is an admission that, in the Middle East at least, the concept of forward defense on a large scale is viewed as part of a grand strategy to expand its influence.

For Iran's regional rivals, the Islamic Republic's forward defense is considered a case of an ideological commitment rather than an Iranian national security imperative. That Tehran's reliance on forward defense and depending on foreign militias is mostly by choice, driven by Tehran geopolitical choices and principally its rivalry with the United States and her regional allies. In turn, states such as Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and, to a lesser extent, Turkey, are determined to stop Iran in its tracks even as they each are pursuing their own versions of geopolitical forward defense from Yemen to Syria to Libya. As part of this cycle, many billions of dollars are invested in competition for influence in the region.[73]

The resultant proxy warfare arms races pose a challenge to Iranian strategy, which has sought to minimize costs to the Iranian people. So far, Iran's forward defense appears largely to have been implemented on a tight budget. Iran is not the biggest military spender in the Middle East today.[74] But Tehran also has far less cash on hand due to American sanctions. President Hassan Rouhani has claimed that American sanctions have cost Iran $200 billion.[75] The issue of Iran's ability to fund its proxy allies, and the reliance of its approach in cases like Syria on stopgap measures that can encourage escalation on the part of its rivals, poses a threat to the sustainability of the forward defense model. However, it is not an imminent risk to Iran's ability to pursue the strategy.

As Tehran has demonstrated over the years, it is able to prioritize. Not every Arab proxy group has the same value to Iran. Hezbollah of Lebanon is, to a significant extent, politically and religiously indistinguishable from the Islamic Republic. There is, however, much daylight between the Houthis of Yemen and the Iranians. Aside from an ability to prioritize if needed and redefine forward defense depending on circumstances, the Iranian regime as a whole, including the IRGC and its foreign branch the Qods Force, have demonstrated that they are rational actors that engage in a systematic cost-benefit analysis when contemplating military action. Acting rationally does not equate to flawless execution, however. The Iranian military strategy bears the hallmark of trial and error and has proven to be open to mishaps. The Islamic Republic likes to portray itself as a martyrdom-seeking state, but in reality, Iran's military strategy remains cautious.

Moreover, while the Islamist message has helped Tehran mobilize support in certain pockets in the Arab World, and provided it with a vehicle to expand its regional influence and with Iraq as the best example, excessive attachment to a sectarian agenda can create its own problems for Tehran. The Islamist ruling elite in Tehran is aware of the perils of Iran becoming an entrenched Shia power in an Islamic World where the Shia are a minority and Iran's Islamist credentials are dwindling. Tehran does not want to feed the narrative that Iran is a Shia sectarian power bent on expanding its influence in Sunni-majority Arab countries.

Meanwhile, as the Islamic Republic faces a deep crisis of legitimacy at home, it is difficult to see how Tehran can stay the course without risking political blowback from an Iranian public that yearns for nation-building at home and an end to costly foreign projects. This anger is nothing new but Soleimani's assassination, and Washington's determination to push back against Iranian regional efforts, might give enough reason for the political and military elite in Tehran to rethink the concept and the sustainability of the forward defense doctrine.

In Western analysis, Soleimani is often depicted as a brilliant strategist who exploited chaos in Iraq and Syria to project Iranian power. There is no doubt that he managed before his death to cultivate a warrior image for himself. But Soleimani, and his brothers-in-arms in the IRGC, have come to a critical juncture. Washington has openly warned Soleimani's successor, Esmail Ghaani, that he too will be assassinated if he opts to follow in the footsteps of his predecessor.[76]

This ultimatum presents the biggest challenge for the Islamists in Tehran and test of the proxy warfare strategy. Forward defense and the use of foreign proxies, such as Hezbollah or the Iraqi militant Shia groups, are today seen by the average public inside Iran and in the broader Middle East as a projection of the ideological zeal of the Islamic Republic and a trend that is depleting Iranian national resources while fueling a costly competition for regional influence with regional rivals. The United States has settled upon a strategy that views this as a sufficient leverage point to enable coercion of Iranian policymakers by moving the conflict towards more direct confrontation.

However, the IRGC appears to view its proxy network, built over four decades, as a sustainable counterweight that can survive such pressure. As a result, the current uncertainty regarding whose assessment of the sustainability of Iran's proxy strategy is correct is likely to prompt a series of crises in which the U.S.-Iran conflict moves towards direct confrontation as the two sides play a game of chicken. Important to watch across these crises, however, is the extent to which Iran increasingly plays up ideological rhetoric to sustain both transnational and domestic mobilization amid the repeated crises.

Whether or not the mobilization methods are successful in prolonging the sustainability of Iran's strategy, they will likely play a critical role in shaping the IRGC of the 2020s, just as previous actions shaped today's IRGC. Those changes bear close monitoring by policymakers and consideration as the United States continues to pursue its strategy of amping up the pressure on Iran as a way to force the leadership in Tehran to reconsider their priorities.

Underwater Drone Incidents Point to China's Expanding Intelligence Gathering

H I Sutton
Commentary, 15 January 2021

China's apparent efforts to survey within other country's territorial waters may go unchallenged.

The proliferation of small uncrewed underwater vehicles (UUVs) poses new challenges to governments. Even seemingly innocent civilian drones, used to gather hydrographic data, can pose a long-term security risk. The data is defence-civilian agnostic and can be used as readily for submarine warfare as for environmental research. There is no real way to be sure which, so even 'research' types that have been painted bright yellow are often viewed with suspicion. This has been highlighted by a UUV which recently turned up in Indonesia. It is just one among several, and they can be tied back to China.

China does not like other country's UUVs in their waters. When Chinese fishing vessels find a foreign one, they can receive a life-changing reward from the government. In December 2016, a Chinese boat intentionally plucked a US Navy UUV out of international waters. It was only returned after a diplomatic exchange. It was a glider, a low-power type of UUV which travels with the current, collecting data.

Four years after the US Navy glider incident, in December 2020, a broadly similar glider was found by Indonesian fishermen. There is one significant difference: this glider is Chinese. In fact, many of the gliders and other underwater vehicles washing up on beaches or found by fishing vessels are, too.

China's gliders are as ambiguous as any other state's. Despite their high-visibility yellow paint and clear (and likely genuine) connection with civilian research, they are also associated with naval aims. In 2017, the South China Morning Post reported that China was speeding up the deployment of gliders in the South China Sea. Tellingly, the reason given was that this 'could help reveal and track the location of foreign submarines'.

The glider found in Indonesia was a Sea Wing ('Haiyi'). This is the most commonly seen Chinese model and is roughly equivalent to Western types such as the popular Slocum G3 glider. Despite similarities, the Sea Wing has a unique appearance, so it can be confidently identified. It was discovered on 20 December near Selayar Island in the South Sulawes, which is on the eastern side of the Makassar Strait; one of several strategically important sea lines of communication (SLOC) which pass through Indonesia. It connects to the Lombok Strait, a narrow choke point connecting the Pacific and Indian Oceans. Together with the Sunda Strait and the Malacca Strait, which are also in Indonesia's back yard, this may be a critical transit route for the Chinese People's Liberation Army Navy (PLAN) in wartime.

As well as data for submarine detection, or route planning, the gliders may be gathering other strategically relevant data. This could include, for example, information on natural resources which might be plundered in the future, or information on industry, gathered by sampling chemicals entering the sea from rivers.

There were four earlier known instances of Sea Wings being found. On 16 November 2016, one was found near Quang Ngai in Vietnam. Then, on 12 February 2019, one was found near the northern tip of Bangka Island in Indonesia. This was quickly followed on 23 March 2019 by another in the Riau Islands. This one was helpfully labelled with the Chinese characters for 'Sea Wing' and 'China Shenyang Institute of Automation, Chinese Academy of Science'. Given the short time interval, these two occurrences may have originated from the same mother ship.

On 22 January 2020, one was found near the Masalembu Islands at the eastern end of the Java Sea, which is located on the eastern side of the Makassar Strait. This fourth example was likely still relatively newly deployed, complete with most of its yellow paint. This was followed in December by the Selayar Island example described above.

These may have been placed in the water by China's large fleet of survey ships. They range far and wide, even to the east coast of the US and to Antarctica. Analysis of their deployments with assistance from The Intel Lab, using data from MarineTraffic.com, shows a number of transits through Indonesian waters in the past two years. These included several surveys of the Indian Ocean. The ships transited all three strategic waterways through Indonesia: the Malacca Strait, Sunda Strait and Lombok Strait.

In December 2019, China deployed 12 Sea Wings in the Indian Ocean. The survey ship Xiangyanghong 06 was used, and is one of those analysed by The Intel Lab. But the mother ships do not have to be dedicated survey ships. These gliders are small and autonomous enough that they can be launched from almost any vessel, right down to a rubber dingy. Analysis of China's survey ships is a strong indicator of where they are looking to deploy, but these gliders could also be launched covertly by other means.

The Sea Wing is similar to other gliders. The basic principle that it uses is called 'buoyancy propulsion'. Instead of using battery power to turn a screw to propel itself along, it uses forward momentum from first sinking and then rising. It has an oil bladder which is inflated to cause it to rise after it has sunk to the desired depth. The glider-like wings extend the distances travelled, and a small rudder gives it a limited capability to control its direction, although it is still largely at the mercy of the currents. When it reaches the surface, a long antenna is used to send data to base. All of this still requires a battery, as do its sensors, but its endurance is extremely long.

All of the gliders found have carried a distinctive sensor on the outside of their fuselage. By analysing the available photographic evidence, these can be identified as measuring conductivity, temperature and depth (CTD). They are visually identical to a model made by a leading US glider manufacturer. These craft likely carry a range of other sensors too, many of which have both civilian and naval uses.

But why are so many Sea Wing gliders turning up? There must be even more that are undiscovered, or found but not reported on. Generally, gliders are semi-reliable and users expect to lose some from time to time. They have a limited battery life, and some may sink or get washed up before they can be recovered. Normally, when a glider is found, the owning organisation is keen to get it back (or, at the very least, retrieve any data from the onboard memory).

Perhaps the relatively high number of reported incidents is because the Sea Wing model is less reliable. But this doesn't ring true for people familiar with the Chinese programme, as Chinese gliders are now typically on par with Western types.

Another possibility is that China is deploying such a large number that more are bound to get lost. This is possible, but a third reason seems to fit the circumstances. China may be using them in a way where a higher loss rate is expected and tolerated.

All four of the Sea Wings found in Indonesia were in territorial waters. This means that permission would have been required, whether for military or civilian purposes. Generally, a government representative would be aboard the survey ship to ensure that the activities are in line with the permissions given. The data would also, in many cases, be shared with the host country. Sometimes, extra stipulations are given, such as not allowing data sharing with third countries. Indonesia has in the past been reluctant to grant these permissions to foreign research vessels.

When the most recent glider was found, the Indonesian military held a press conference where they displayed the vehicle. It was reported that they did not know its origin. This is despite it clearly being a Sea Wing, and essentially identical to three others previously found in Indonesian waters. So, this explanation seems unlikely. But it also suggests that it has not been claimed, meaning it likely does not relate to an authorised survey.

It seems plausible, therefore, that China has deployed the gliders to gather strategic data in Indonesian territorial waters. The last two – which were found east of the Makassar Strait – bolster this theory, as does the fact that this has been done without the permission of the Indonesian government. That said, it can be difficult to link an individual glider to a specific operation. Their innocent-looking yellow paint and tendency to drift in the currents is the embodiment of plausible deniability.

These easily deniable assets are now an emerging threat to states' sovereignty, and one which is hard to stop. We may, therefore, expect to see an increasing number of Chinese UUVs turning up in unexpected places.

China Using ‘Cognitive Warfare’ Against Taiwan, Observers Say

By Joyce Huang
January 17, 2021 04:44 AM

TAIPEI - A Taipei think tank and observers in Taiwan say China is trying to influence residents with “cognitive warfare,” hoping to reverse opposition to Beijing’s desired takeover of Taiwan so it can be accomplished without having to go to war.

Taiwanese attitudes have been drifting away from the mainland, especially among the younger generation, whose members see themselves “born independent” with no ties to China.

China’s effort, these analysts say, includes tactics ranging from military intimidation and propaganda to misinformation spread by its army of online trolls in a bid to manipulate public opinion. They say the complexity and frequency of the effort puts Taiwan on a constant defensive.

“Its ultimate goal is to control what’s between the ears. That is, your brain or how you think, which [Beijing] hopes leads to a change of behavior,” Tzeng Yi-suo, director of the cybersecurity division at the government-funded Institute of National Defense and Security Research in Taipei, told VOA.

Campaign intensifies amid COVID

Cognitive warfare is a fairly new term, but the concept has been around for decades. China has never stopped trying to deter the island's separatists, according to Tzeng, who wrote about the Chinese efforts last month in the institute's annual report on China's political and military development.

Liberal democracies such as Taiwan, that ensure the free flow of information, are vulnerable to cognitive attacks by China, while China's tightly controlled media and internet environment makes it difficult for democracies to counterattack, according to Tzeng.

China's campaign has intensified since the outbreak of COVID-19, using official means such as flying military jets over Taiwan, and unofficial channels such as news outlets, social media and hackers to spread misinformation. The effort is aimed at dissuading Taiwan from pursuing actions contrary to Beijing's interests, the report said.

China has used these tactics to attack Taiwan President Tsai Ing-wen's administration, undermine support for democracy and fuel Taiwan's social tensions and political divide, it said.

The South China Situation Probing Initiative, for example, a project run by Najing University in China, has disseminated information about Chinese military activities in the region through its Twitter account, but some of the posts have been found to be false, apparently aimed at intimidating Taiwan's public and weakening Tsai's Democratic Progressive Party government's resolve, according to the report.

Tzeng said China's efforts didn't work in Taiwan's presidential election last January, when Tsai won a landslide victory. The island's growing anti-China sentiments – seem further strengthened by disapproval of China's brutal suppression of pro-democracy Hong Kong protests.

China "set out to [actively] promote the island's reunification with the mainland, its identity as ethnic Chinese or favorable views toward the CCP [Chinese Communist Party]. But now all it can hope for is to curb Taiwan's [growing] pro-independence sentiments" – a trend Beijing has found it difficult to contain, he said.

Tzeng added that he believes China is biding its time and experimenting with new tactics, which it hopes will succeed in influencing the island's future elections.

For example, the report said that China's Communist Party is believed to have played a role in hacking Tsai's office in May to discredit her. Reporters covering her office at the time claimed to have received minutes of internal meetings from an anonymous email account, which accused the president of corruption. Tsai's administration responded by saying that the documents had been doctored and contained fabricated content.

Taiwan should, Tzeng said, stay alert and establish a comprehensive fact-checking system to prevent fake news and misinformation from subverting public opinion.

Taiwan should also "work with regional and global liberal democracies to establish a common defense mechanism" as China's influencing attacks have a global outreach and aren't limited to Taiwan. They constitute the most serious challenge facing democratic societies today, Tung Li-wen, former head of the ruling DPP's China affairs department, wrote in a 2019 essay.

Chinese citizen journalist and blogger Zhou Shuguang, who now lives in Taiwan, said many Chinese have taken to the internet to spread China's narrative. Two groups of such online promoters of China's narrative are known as "Little Pink" and "50 Cent Party," The groups, he said, have formed China's sizable army of online trolls to spread fake news, for example, rumors about Tsai's academic background. Despite repeated clarifications, many kept circling rumors that the president's 1984 doctorate degree from the London School of Economics was fake.

A 2016 study, led by Harvard University data scientist Gary King, found that 50 Cent Party produced 488 million "fake" social media posts a year to distract other internet users from news and online discussions painting the Communist Party in a negative light.

Global propaganda campaign

China has also been aggressive in expanding its global propaganda campaign to "tell China's story well" and disrupt democracy, said Huang Jaw-nian, an assistant professor of National Chengchi University in Taipei, who specializes in media politics.

"[China] is running its global propaganda campaign by expanding its state media abroad and deploying a strategy called 'borrowing a boat out to sea,' that is, buying up foreign news outlets [with better credibility]... The media buyouts are, in some cases, made by pro-Beijing businesspeople," who will likely spin coverage to curry favor with China, Huang told VOA.

However, Li Zhenguang, deputy director of Beijing Union University's Institute of Taiwan Studies, flatly denied that China has launched any efforts against Taiwan or Tsai's administration.

"She [Tsai] is putting a feather in her own cap. She is a nobody to China. I find the accusations nonsense. Why on earth does China want to attack her?" he told VOA over the phone, refusing to elaborate.

How phishing attacks are evolving and why you should care

Cybercriminal gangs and nation-state threat actors continue to evolve their phishing attack techniques, experimenting with different lures, adopting new social engineering tricks, and devising new ways to avoid detection in 2021.

According to the annual Microsoft Digital Defense Report, threat actors, focused on malware attacks to harvest people's credentials in the past, have recently shifted their focus to phishing attacks (~70%). Experts observed threat actors sending out emails imitating top brands like Microsoft, UPS, Amazon, Apple, and Zoom.

> The ENISA Threat Landscape 2020 report states that cyberattacks are becoming more sophisticated, targeted, widespread, and undetected.

While malware stands strong as the #1 cyber threat in the EU, experts observed a significant increase in phishing, identity theft, and ransomware attacks in 2020.

Image by ENISA: Cyberattacks becoming more sophisticated, targeted, widespread and undetected

Here are some interesting findings from the ENISA report related to phishing campaigns monitored in the last twelve months:

- Losses of €26.2 billion in 2019 with Business E-mail Compromise (BEC) attacks
- 42.8% of all malicious attachments were Microsoft Office documents
- 667% increase in phishing scams in just 1 month during the COVID-19 pandemic
- 30% of phishing messages were delivered on Mondays
- 32.5% of all e-mails used the keyword 'payment' in the e-mail subject

A constantly evolving threat

Security firms warn that attackers are rapidly evolving to evade detection.

> The majority of phishing attempts today are "polymorphic" in nature.

This means that attackers make slight and often random changes to an email's artefacts (i.e. template, content, subject, sender name, domains). The morphing allows them to make phishing attacks difficult to detect for signature-based email defence solutions.

Polymorphic phishing attacks are not new, however. Experts began observing them since at least 2016. The first attacks only changed the embedded URLs pointing to their landing pages that were only deployed for a few hours. These URLs were difficult to label as malicious by automated scanning and blacklisting software due to their short lifespan. Making continuous changes to the URLs allowed attackers to avoid detection.

While phishing detection tools were becoming more effective in implementing new detection capabilities, attackers started variating an increasing number of components in the message to avoid them. Threat actors also changed their tactics by sending only a small number of messages to avoid creating "noise" that could be easily detected by email filters.

> Today, phishing attacks are becoming much more targeted.

Once a bad actor has obtained the credentials of an employee within an organization, they will use them to target colleagues in surgical and polymorphic operations.

Another trick employed by threat actors behind phishing campaigns is the use of HTTPS sites. According to ENISA, more than two-thirds (74%) of phishing sites adopted HTTPS in Q4 2020. The experts at ENISA pointed out that the presence of a lock icon at the browser's address bar may trick victims into thinking that the messages are sent from a trusted website. In some cases, threat actors also use legitimate sites that have been hacked to host phishing pages, making it hard to detect malicious activity.

> "Other factors contributing to the steep rise in HTTPS usage are the plethora of free certificate services such as Let's Encrypt and the fact that modern browsers mark every HTTPS site as secure, without any further checks."
> — states the ENISA report.

Phishing-as-a-service on the rise

Security experts also warn of the rise of Phishing-as-a-Service (PaaS) in the cybercrime underground.

Crooks can pay for phishing kits that can be accessed by subscribing to such services. A security researcher identified over 5,334 unique phishing kits by June 2019 that were offered for a price ranging from $50 to $80 for a monthly subscription. Most of the kits (87%) included evasion mechanisms such as HTML character encoding and content encryption. Some of these services were hosted on legitimate cloud services with proper domain name system (DNS) names and certificates.

> During the past months, security firms spotted multiple creative phishing techniques to avoid detection.

In November 2020, researchers at WMC Global have spotted a new creative Office 365 phishing campaign that has been inverting images used as backgrounds for landing pages to avoid getting flagged as malicious by security solutions that scan the web for phishing sites.

The bot avoidance mechanism has been deployed on multiple phishing websites designed to steal Office 365 credentials.

WMC Global researchers observed this technique implemented in a phishing kit developed by a threat actor that was selling it to multiple users.

> "Because image recognition software is improving and becoming more accurate, this new technique aims to deceive scanning engines by inverting the colours of the image, causing the image hash to differ from the original. This technique can hinder the software's ability to flag this image altogether."
> — reads the analysis published by WMC Global.

The phishing kit that uses this trick automatically reverts the backgrounds using Cascading Style Sheets (CSS) to make them look just like the backgrounds of legitimate Office 365 login pages.

While phishing detection web crawlers are served the inverted image, the potential victims are redirected to one of these phishing landing pages that will see the original background instead of the inverted one.

Innovative phishing techniques

Recently, experts also observed other phishing campaigns aimed at Office 365 users that were using innovative techniques, such as leveraging public cloud services to host the phishing landing pages.

Another innovative technique observed by the researchers targeting Office 365 users leverages both cloud services from Oracle and Amazon for their infrastructure. The threat actors used compromised accounts to send out phishing messages and used Amazon Web Services (AWS) and Oracle Cloud in the redirect chain.

> "Once the link was clicked, the user is redirected through several proxies, including AWS load balancers, all the way to a legitimate but compromised website."
> — Ofir Rozmann, threat intelligence at Mitiga told Bleeping Computer

Before the victims land on the final landing page, they are redirected through several proxies, including AWS load balancers. Most of the fake Office 365 login pages were hosted on the Oracle Cloud computing service, but experts also observed the use of the Amazon Simple Storage Service.

Mitiga researchers discovered more than 40 compromised websites that were used in this Office 365 phishing campaign. The analysis of the HTML code for the fake Office 365 pages suggests that attackers opted for a PaaS kit.

In November 2020, Microsoft tracked an ongoing Office 365 phishing campaign that was targeting enterprises. The threat actors behind the campaign leveraged redirector URLs with the capability to detect incoming connections from sandbox environments.

Upon detecting connections for sandboxes, the redirector would redirect them to legitimate sites to evade detection, while connections from real potential victims were redirected to phishing pages.

In August, researchers from Malwarebytes analyzed a new evasive phishing technique used by attackers in the wild in Magecart attacks. The hackers targeted visitors of several websites by using typo-squatted domain names, and modified favicons to inject software skimmers used to steal payment card information.

The technique is known as homoglyph attack, it was involved in phishing scams with IDN homograph attacks."The idea is simple and consists of using characters that look the same in order to dupe users," reads the analysis published by Malwarebytes researchers.

> "Sometimes the characters are from a different language set or simply capitalizing the letter 'i' to make it appear like a lowercase 'l'."

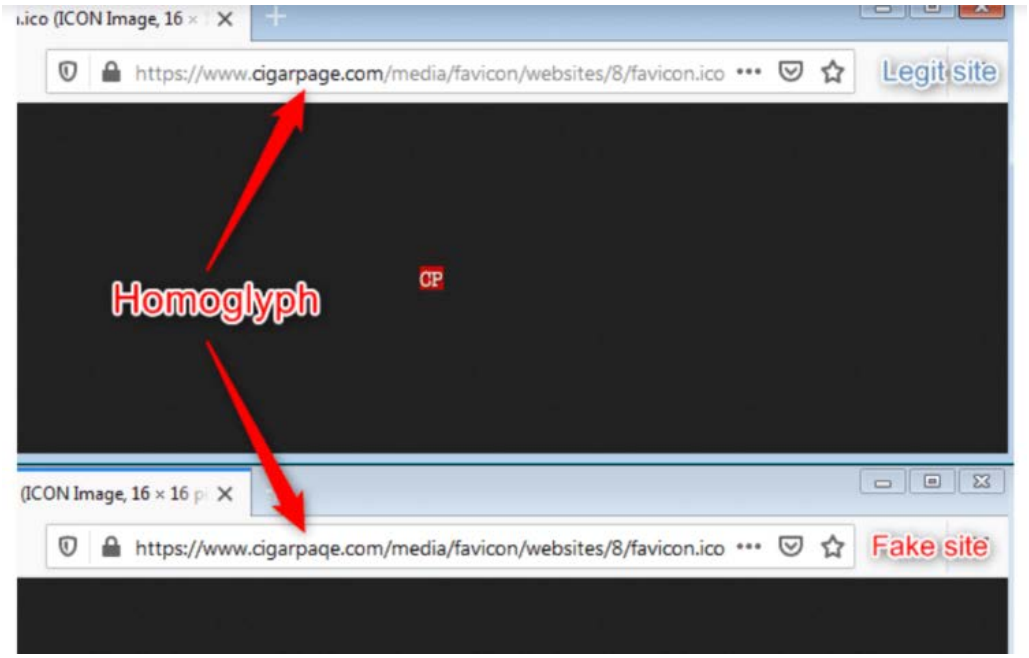
The internationalized domain name (IDN) homograph attack technique has been used by the Magecart group on multiple domains to load the Inter software skimmer inside a favicon file.

The visual trick leverages the similarities of character scripts to register fraudulent domains that appear similar to legitimate ones, then attackers trick victims into visiting them.

While analyzing homoglyph attacks, experts also found legitimate websites (e.g., "cigarpage.com") that were compromised and injected with an innocuous loader for an icon file that loaded a copycat version of the favicon from the typo-squatted domain ("cigarpaqe[.]com").

This favicon loaded from the homoglyph domain allowed the attackers to inject the Inter JavaScript skimmer.



Experts noticed that one of the fraudulent domains ("zoplm.com") involved in this type of attack has been previously tied to Magecart Group 8, the crew that was behind the attacks on NutriBullet, and MyPillow.

How to prevent sophisticated phishing attacks?

Here are a few suggestions for organizations looking to mitigate phishing attacks:

- Train employees to identify a malicious email. Simulated phishing campaigns could allow organisations to test the resilience and responsiveness of the staff.
- Use a secure e-mail gateway with regular (possibly automated) maintenance of filters (anti-spam, anti-malware, policy-based filtering).
- Deploy defence solutions that use machine-learning techniques to identify phishing sites in real-time.
- Disable automatic execution of code, macros, rendering of graphics and preloading mailed links at the mail clients and update them frequently.
- Implement SPF (Sender Policy Framework), DMARC (Domain-based Message Authentication, Reporting & Conformance), and DKIM (Domain Keys Identified Mail) to identify spam.
- Implement anomaly detection at the network level for both inbound and outbound e-mails.
- Check the domain name of the websites you visit for typos, especially for sensitive websites, e.g. bank sites. Relying on the HTTPS connection is not enough.
- Enable two-factor authentication (2FA) whenever applicable to prevent account takeovers.

THREAT and INTIMIDATION RESPONSE GUIDE

IN-PERSON THREAT

A physical IN-PERSON THREAT is when you are in imminent danger because of the close proximity of the person making the threat. You have three options:

1. Run: Identify an escape route. Drop any belongings that may slow you down. If possible, help others escape. Call 911.
2. Hide: Hide away from view of the threat. Lock doors or block entries. Silence your cell phone (including vibrate mode) and remain silent until the threat is over.
3. Fight: Fighting should be a last resort and only when your life is in imminent danger. Attempt to incapacitate the threat. Act with as much physical aggression as possible.

A verbal IN-PERSON THREAT one that does not place the recipient in immediate danger or is intended to be carried out later.

- Write down or otherwise record the threat exactly as it was communicated.
- Record as many descriptive details as possible about the person who made the threat: name, appearance, skin color, sex, height, weight, hair and eye color, voice, clothing, or any other distinguishing features.
- Report the threat to law enforcement.

PHONED THREAT

A PHONED THREAT is a threat received by telephone. You should try to get as much information on the caller and the threat as possible, unless the threat is nearby or may imminently harm you or others.

- Remain calm and do not hang up.
- Keep the caller on as long as possible and try soliciting information to determine whether the threat is specific, realistic, or poses immediate danger to you or others.
- If possible, signal others nearby to listen and notify law enforcement.
- Copy any information from the phone's electronic display.
- Write the exact wording of the threat.
- Record the call if possible.
- Be available to discuss the details with law enforcement personnel.

ELECTRONIC MESSAGE THREAT

An ELECTRONIC MESSAGE THREAT is a threat received through direct messaging, email, or social media. It may include threats of blackmail or adverse consequences if the recipient does not comply.

- Do not open an electronic message or attachment from unknown senders.
- Do not communicate on social media with unknown or unsolicited individuals.
- Make sure your security settings are set to the highest level of protection.

If an electronic threat is received:

- Do not delete the message. Forensic examination may uncover important details.
- Leave the message open on the computer.
- Immediately notify law enforcement.
- Print, photograph, or copy the message, subject line, date, and time.
- Preserve all electronic evidence.

CYBER ATTACKS

A CYBER ATTACK can compromise your electronic device and expose personal information.

- Use strong passphrases and do not use the same passphrase for multiple websites.
- Set anti-virus and anti-malware applications to automatically update.
- Apply system and software updates as soon as they become available.
- Apply two-factor authentication.
- Backup data regularly.

If you suspect that you have been a victim of a cyber attack:

- Do not delete or alter your computer systems.
- Immediately contact your financial institutions to protect your accounts from identity theft.
- Change passphrases and monitor accounts for suspicious activity.

If you are in immediate physical danger, call 911.
If you experience a threat, please contact your local FBI field office (listings available at www.fbi.gov) or submit a tip via 1-800-CALLFBI (or 1-800-225-5324) or via www.fbi.gov/tips.

You can also make an anonymous tip to the FBI by phone or online.

Federal Bureau of Investigation

THREAT and INTIMIDATION RESPONSE GUIDE

Who should I contact if I experience threats or intimidation: local police or the FBI?

- If you or others are in immediate physical danger, call the local police by dialing 911.
- If you experience a threat associated with a federal crime, contact your local FBI field office (listings at www.fbi.gov) by calling 1-800-CALLFBI (or 1-800-225-5324) or via www.fbi.gov/tips. Examples include threats from an agent of a foreign government, organized crime, or a government official. Your report can be anonymous.
- Not all incidents meet the FBI's investigative threshold. If you are the victim of an incident that does not meet the threshold of a federal crime, you may need to report it to your local police department. Local and state jurisdictions have different thresholds for investigating suspected crimes.

What can I expect if I am interviewed by the FBI?

- An FBI agent can meet with you at an FBI field office or at another location.
- The FBI will ask you to provide as much information as possible about the perpetrator and details of the threat you have experienced.
- The FBI will ask for your contact information to follow-up with you if needed.
- The FBI will attempt to protect your identity and confidentiality.
- If appropriate, an FBI Victim Specialist may be present during the interview to provide information and support, or they may contact you after your interview by phone or mail.

What is the threshold for the FBI to investigate a complaint and/or initiate an investigation?

- The FBI is able to investigate threats that violate US federal law and imply harm or danger to the recipient.
- The ability of the US Government to prosecute individuals for threat-related charges is contingent upon several factors, such as: the quality of the evidence, the ability to identify the individuals who perpetrated the action, the identification of a conspiracy, and/or the ability to arrest the offending individuals.

What can I expect if the FBI initiates an investigation?

- If the FBI believes a federal crime may have been committed, one or more FBI special agents will conduct an investigation. As part of the investigation, the special agents will gather evidence, which may include an interview with you and other victims.
- You may also be asked to describe your experience before a federal grand jury.
- A thorough investigation will be completed. The investigation may take a long time to finish, and you will not be updated on day-to-day case developments. Every effort will be made to tell you about major events in an investigation, such as an arrest or indictment. The FBI is committed to providing such information to you before it is released to the public, when possible. However, the FBI must always be careful not to reveal sensitive information that could hurt the investigation or increase danger to law enforcement.

Russian experts and commentators have sought to draw key military lessons from the Second Karabakh War (September 27–November 9, 2020), which concluded in a decisive victory for the Azerbaijani side, actively supported by Turkey (see Part One in EDM, January 5, 2021). However, last year's deadly conflict in the South Caucasus also had important informational-ideological, geopolitical and economic implications for Russia.

In the informational-ideological realm, most Russian observers evaluated the outcome of the war as overtly negative for Moscow and exceptionally beneficial for Ankara, whose prestige and "soft power" (pan-Turkism), they predict, are now likely to skyrocket among Turkic-speaking peoples. Importantly, as the main theaters/venues where Turkish influence is bound to grow, many Russian experts mention not only the independent former Soviet republics (mainly Azerbaijan and the countries of Central Asia) but also many non-ethnic-Russian citizens of the Russian Federation itself (Vpoanalytics.com, November 11, 2020). For instance, Konstantin Makienko, the deputy direct of the Center for Analysis of Strategies and Technologies, has argued that since Armenia—Russia's "client and ally"—found itself on the losing side, whereas Azerbaijan and its Turkish ally clearly won, Ankara's influence in the post-Soviet space (especially parts with large Islamic populations) will grow exponentially and supplant Moscow (Vedomosti, November 10, 2020).

In the geopolitical domain, Russian experts have indicated two important troublesome aspects. First are the Karabakh war's implications for the Donbas region. Specifically, some commentators have contended that the results of the conflict in the South Caucasus could (possibly, and probably not immediately) encourage Ukraine to attempt to "solve the issue" of occupied Donbas in a military way. Interestingly, Russian sources expressed visible concerns over recently held military drills in Ukraine. According to the exercise legend, the Ukrainian Armed Forces were practicing liberating parts of Donbas. The most important part of these exercises involved Ukrainian forces actively relying on Turkish-supplied unmanned aerial combat vehicles (UCAV)—one of the main (if not the key) component that secured Azerbaijan's military success last autumn (Lenta.ru, November 18). Other analysts also noted that Ukraine's mounting activities in areas near the Donbas frontline—for example, boosting the overall number of military formations in the area—may indicate Kyiv's desire (using the example of Azerbaijan) to try to launch a military operation in the future (Nezavisimaya Gazeta, December 6, 2020).

The second oft-repeated set of geopolitical concerns is related to Turkey's growing ambitions in the South Caucasus and Central Asia. According to renowned Russian expert Dr. Andrey Kortunov, this new configuration creates a new reality whereby "the main security threats to Russia no longer stem from the western direction, but rather from the south—the Greater Caucasus region and, ultimately, from Central Asia as well" (Globalbrief.ca, October 4, 2020).

Lastly, in the economic domain, concerns expressed by the Russian expert community mainly revolve around the following question: to what extent will Turkish-backed Azerbaijan's military superiority affect the international reputation of Russian-produced weaponry? One such analysis argues that the results of the military engagements in Karabakh introduced fresh doubts about the actual capabilities of Russian-produced radio-electronic and Electronic Warfare (EW) battlefield assets. Specifically, the director of the Institute of the World Economy and International Relations of the Russian Academy of Science, Fedor Voytolovskii, asserts that the conflict "demonstrated the potential of the Turkish defense-industrial complex very clearly… Turkey will be able to attract many potential buyers on the global weapons market" (Nezavisimaya Gazeta, November 26, 2020). Undoubtedly, such an outcome would negatively affect Russia's position in this lucrative economic space.

Another important detail on the subject appeared in the Russian media late last year. Namely, as a result of its military defeat and disgruntlement over the performance of the Russian EW/radio-electronic weapons that Armenian forces had been relying on, Yerevan is reportedly now determined to stop purchasing this type of equipment from Moscow, switching instead to German suppliers. According to Russian sources, "[A]bsolutely all means of radio-electronic confrontation, including the Repellent system [designed for collecting signal intelligence on enemy UAVs and suppressing their control systems], turned out to be useless against Turkish drones, whereas a portion of these complexes were simply destroyed." Other Russian experts, however, claimed that instead of blaming the Russian EW technology, Armenia could have acquired Krasukha complexes, which "have proven their effectiveness in Libya and Syria" (Avia.pro, November 26, 2020). In any event, should Yerevan's military-political leadership opt for Western suppliers—whether because of real deficiencies of the Russian EW assets, or for internal political reasons—that shift would represent a huge reputational loss for Russia and a large economic blow for its domestic arms manufacturers since other potential buyers (with far more impressive economic capabilities than Armenia) might be discouraged from dealing with Moscow.

Similarly, Russian experts have voiced concerns over the quality of domestically produced armored vehicles and anti-missile/anti-aircraft systems. According to Azerbaijani sources, more than 350 Armenian armored vehicles were destroyed and/or captured during the fighting around Karabakh last fall—a number comparable with some of the world's largest military operations, including the Battle of Prokhorovka (1943) and the Battle for the Golan Heights (1973). These staggering numbers were so high despite the fact that main battle tanks were not involved in military operations in large quantities in the Second Karabakh War. Crucially, according to President Ilham Aliyev, the Azerbaijani armed forces destroyed an impressive quantity of other Armenian (Russian-produced) weaponry, with the total cost of this lost equipment exceeding $3 billion. Inter alia, this included S-300 surface-to-air missile (SAM) systems with radio locators (seven pieces), an Oborona radio-location station (one), Tor missile systems (five), Osa short-range anti-air systems (forty); KUB mobile SAM systems (four), a KRUG medium-range SAM system (one); Zastava UAVs (fourteen), as well as S-125 SAM systems (two). Moreover, all in all, 19 pieces of EW/radio-electronic equipment were destroyed. Taking this into consideration, Russian experts argue that "the Russian side needs to come up with some explanations as to how such large quantities of weaponry ended up destroyed in a such a short interim," otherwise, this could be taken negatively by current and potential buyers of Russian arms (Nezavisimaya Gazeta, December 6, 2020).

So despite some cheerful rhetoric coming out of Moscow's state-sponsored information outlets, reputable Russian experts are, indeed, concerned about the implications of the Second Karabakh War beyond the military realm, to include potential geopolitical, economic and reputational losses for Russia. It remains to be seen to what degree their fears will come to pass over the coming months.

Year 2020 in Review: Results of Russia's Nuclear Weapons Modernization

Russia continues to press ahead with its nuclear weapons modernization program; however, domestic production difficulties and the coronavirus pandemic hindered the development of its latest strategic systems during the course of the last year.

In 2020, the Strategic Missile Forces (Raketnye Voyska Strategicheskogo Naznacheniya—RVSN) were ordered to deploy for combat duty 20 launchers armed with Yars intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBM) as well as 2 UR-100N UTTH launchers with the Avangard hypersonic glide vehicle (RIA Novosti, December 24, 2019 and October 13, 2020). These tasks were completed. Two regiments of the RVSN's Barnaul Missile Division were re-equipped with mobile-based Yars ICBMs, while a missile regiment of the Kozelsk division was filled out by equipping it with a separate variant of this ICBM complex (Izvestia, December 21, 2020). The Dombarovsky Division, meanwhile, received two missiles with the Avangard hypersonic glide vehicle (Izvestia, December 22, 2020). Yet besides these modest accomplishments, Russia's nuclear arms modernization efforts during the past 12 months saw wide-ranging delays affecting its flagship projects.

Last year was supposed to see the first flight design tests of Russia's newest intercontinental ballistic missile, the RS-28 Sarmat. But those never occurred. The initial stage of testing is to involve two launches of a missile with a mass-dimensional dummy warhead, from the silo at the Plesetsk cosmodrome to the Kura test range in Kamchatka. Ultimately, Russia plans to conduct at least five test launches in total before starting operational production. The phase one tests launches were originally scheduled for the beginning of 2019 (RIA Novosti, December 17, 2018). However, in July 2019, those flight tests were postponed to the end of 2020 (Interfax, July 6, 2019).

In May 2020, Deputy Prime Minister Yuri Borisov said that preparations for the Sarmat's flight tests had not been interrupted by the COVID-19 pandemic (RIA Novosti, May 21, 2020). And in August, the head of Roscosmos, Dmitry Rogozin, reiterated those claims (Interfax, August 24, 2020). At least two tests of the missile were to be carried out before the end of the year (Vedomosti, October 29, 2019). But in the end, there was not even one such test, having again been deferred until the following year. Moreover, in December, authorities noted that the Sarmat missiles would not begin entering service in 2020, as had heretofore been the plan; instead, the ICBM would only start to appear in 2022 (Radio Sputnik, December 16, 2020).

Intercontinental ballistic missile test launches, by their nature, are quite difficult and expensive to organize. On December 30, Deputy Defense Minister Alexey Krivoruchko said that flight tests of the Sarmat will begin in the near future (Rossiyskaya Gazeta, December 30, 2020). However, to complete the trials, Russia will first need to upgrade the testing site. Indeed, Minister of Defense Sergei Shoigu recently admitted that a test range for flight trials of the Sarmat missile system has yet to be built; but plans call for completion of such a launch site, near the village of Severo-Yeniseysky, in Krasnoyarsk region, sometime during 2011 (TVZvezda, December 21, 2020).

Drastic delays and planning setbacks affected other strategic platforms as well. In 2020, Russia's Long-Range Aviation (Aviatsiya Dalnego Deystviya—ADD) was to receive six upgraded Tu-95MS strategic missile carrier planes. However, at the end of the year, the Ministry of Defense received only five aircraft (Mil.ru, December 2020). In this case, the problem was related to unsatisfactory management and mounting debts of the production plant (Bloknot-taganrog.ru, November 12, 2020).

Similarly, at the end of 2020, the Tupolev Company was supposed to transfer two new Tu-160M strategic bombers to the Ministry of Defense for state testing (Interfax, August 26, 2019). This did not happen because of the pandemic. First, the Tu-160M test pilots and support crews could not make it to the Kazan Aviation Plant for a long time, thus forcing delays to flight test schedules. Second, representatives of the suppliers of the new aircraft systems were also barred from accessing the production facilities for an extended period. Third, coronavirus-related shutdowns prevented specialists on the implementation of new technological equipment from entering the Kazan plant, creating even more delays to development of the latest Tu-160M model (Business Gazeta, May 8, 2020). Throughout all of 2020, the Ministry of Defense received only two upgraded, but still Soviet-built, Tu-160s (TASS, April 23, 2020). The aircraft received more advanced inertial navigation and engine-control systems as well as weapons devices driven by modern digital technologies.

Finally, COVID-19 derailed development plans for naval nuclear weapons (see EDM, December 2, 2020). In April 2020, sea and state trials of the K-329 Belgorod submarine were to begin; and the vessel was supposed to be transferred to the Military-Maritime Fleet (Voyenno-Morskoi Flot—VMF) by the end of the year (TASS, June 26, 2019). The Belgorod is to carry the Poseidon (a.k.a. Status-6) autonomous nuclear-tipped super-torpedo. Yet as a result of the pandemic-related delays, the defense ministry only announced on July 27 that tests were being conducted (Sudostroenie.info, July 27, 2020). And an unnamed source within the Russian military-industrial complex said last May that the tests of the Belgorod would continue for another year and a half (RIA Novosti, May 26, 2020). At the same time, the first test-launch of the Poseidon was supposed to take place in the fall of 2020 (Flotprom.ru, May 26, 2020). That trial has still not been completed. Another vessel designed to carry and launch the Poseidon nuclear super-torpedo—the first submarine of the new Khabarovsk-class, which was supposed to be launched in the spring of 2020 (Rossiyskaya Gazeta, May 14, 2019)—also failed to materialize.

The Borei-A-class submarine Knyaz Oleg was ultimately not transferred in 2020 either, despite the defense ministry's previous expectations that this could be accomplished (Kremlin.ru, December 24, 2019). In addition to mooring as well as factory and state trials of all of the submarine's structures and mechanisms, it will still be necessary to conduct a test launch of the Bulava missile from this vessel. This means that it is far from certain that the SevMash company will be able to transfer the Knyaz Oleg to the navy even before the end of 2021.

Management and technical issues, compounded by last year's coronavirus restrictions and accompanying delays, had relatively little impact on the overall growth of advanced weapons in the nuclear triad. According to previous planning, the share of advanced weapons in the nuclear triad was supposed to increase from 82 to 87 percent by the end of 2020 (RIA Novosti, March 25, 2020), and according to official data, that share reached 86 percent by last December. On the other hand, the coronavirus had a much greater negative effect on the testing of weapons under development. Because of this, the impact of the pandemic will be quite long lasting. Already, the Ministry of Defense's planning has become more modest: by the end of 2021, it projects a further increase in the share of the latest nuclear weapons by only 2 percent (Kremlin, December 21, 2020).

Russian MoD Ordered Two More Borei-A-class SSBN from Sevmash - Naval News

TASS Russian news agency

> "In July, a contract was signed with the Defense Ministry for the construction of another two Borey-A-class nuclear submarines. They are the Dmitry Donskoy and the Knyaz Potemkin,"
> Sevmash shipyard CEO Mikhail Budnichenko

Budnichenko recalled that the Knyaz Vladimir lead submarine of upgraded project 955A was handed over to the Navy in June 2020. The Knyaz Oleg SSBN was rolled out of the slipway in July. The shipyard is building four SSBN — the Knyaz Oleg, the Generalissimo Suvorov, the Emperor Alexander III and the Knyaz Pozharsky.

Sevmash laid the Knyaz Vladimir in July 2012 and floated it in November 2017. It joined the Navy in June 2020 making the construction time last 96 months. The Knyaz Oleg was laid in July 2014 and floated in July 2020. It has to join the Navy in 2021.

The Generalissimo Suvorov was laid in December 2014, the Emperor Alexander III in December 2015, and the Knyaz Pozharsky in December 2016.

If the fifth and sixth SSBN are laid in 2021, they may join the Navy in 2027-2028. Thus, Russia will have ten project 955 and 955A SSBN (the Yuri Dolgoruky, the Alexander Nevsky and the Vladimir Monomakh of project 955 and seven SSBN of project 955A).

K-535 Yuriy Dolgorukiy is the first Borei-class ballistic missile submarine of the Project 955 in service with the Russian Navy.

The Russian Navy currently operates four SSBN of projects 955 and 955A, one SSBN of project 677BDR (the Ryazan), six SSBN of project 677BDRM (the Verkhoturye, the Yekaterinburg, the Tula, the Bryansk, the Karelia and the Novomoskovsk) and one SSBN of project 941 (the Dmitry Donskoy). It makes a total of twelve SSBN. All Soviet-built submarines are to be decommissioned and replaced by new SSBN by the end of the decade.

The naming of a new SSBN after Dmitry Donskoy means that the last SSBN of project 941 with the same name would be decommissioned. The Navy will also get rid of project 667BDR submarines. It is unclear which project 677BDRM subs will be replaced. The decision will depend on the technical state of each submarine.

If Sevmash signs another contract for two SSBN of project 955A in the coming years, it will fully switch the sea component of the Russian nuclear deterrence to fourth-generation SSBN by early 2030s.

The Russian S-70 Okhotnik UCAV Struck Ground Targets With Unguided Bombs During Weapons Testing

January 14, 2021 Drones, Russia, Troubled Areas

STEFANO D'URSO

In December it was also announced that the S-70 Okhotnik drone was tested in flight with captive air-to-air missiles in the fighter role

The Russian next-generation Unmanned Combat Aerial Vehicle (UCAV) Sukhoi S-70 Okhotnik (Hunter) struck some ground targets in the Ashuluk range (home of the Russian Aerospace Forces' Combat Training and Combat Application Center) in southern Russia, according to a source in the military-industrial complex cited by the Russian News Agency RIA Novosti. The drone hit the target with high accuracy using 500 kg (1100 lb) free-fall unguided bombs, likely the standard FAB-500 M-62 bomb used by Russian aircraft, carried in the weapons bay.

The source did not disclose when this test happened, but mentioned that this was not the first bombing test of the drone. Further details included that the UCAV may have been recently upgraded to add new capabilities, as the source was quoted as saying that "the newest sighting and navigation system installed on the Okhotnik makes it possible to use free-falling ammunition with an accuracy approaching that of a high-precision guided weapon."

Advertisement

Interestingly he added that the S-70 can autonomously engage "stationary and restrictedly mobile ground targets" with known coordinates, either preplanned or received from another source while inflight. While this could be just speculation, the few details disclosed by the source may suggest that the drone is using a Continually Computed Release Point (CCRP) method of bombing, normally used when the target's coordinates are known.

This method involves a computer calculating the optimal release point for the bomb to hit the target, taking into account the aircraft flight parameters (speed, altitude, etc), the weapon's parameters (speed, drag, etc), the target position and eventually its movements, as opposed to Constantly Computed Impact Point (CCIP) where the pilot has to put a pipper, which indicates the desired impact point, right on target, usually in a dive.

However, if the target is moving after the bomb release, the new changes in the position will not be taken into account, making a hit possible only if the target is moving very slowly. Obviously, in that case a direct hit would be much less probable than a hit by shrapnel in the immediate vicinity of the target (unless guided weapons are used).

The bombing test of the Okhotnik, which first flew in 2019, was preceded about a month ago by the announcement of the testing with air-to-air missiles in the fighter role. This test also happened over the Ashuluk range and was reportedly the first weapon testing performed after months of assessments of the flight qualities and on-board systems.

After the air-to-air test, a source mentioned by RIA Novosti said that several flights were performed captive training missiles, which are identical to the live missile but missing the rocket engine and the warhead. Both IR-guided and radar-guided missiles were used to assess the UCAV's avionics coupled with the missile guidance systems and the Su-57 "Felon" which was accompanying the drone. This could be a further demonstration that the S-70 could be intended also to act as a "Loyal Wingman" for the Su-57 in future.

The type of the weapons was not specified, other than saying that they were both IR-guided and radar-guided missiles. This would somewhat restrict the field to the R-73/AA-11A Archer IR-guided short-range missile and its derivate R-74/AA-11B Archer, and the R-77/AA-12 Adder active radar-guided medium range missile.

The R-73 and R-74 are the standard short-range air-to-air missile of the Russian Aerospace Forces, with the latter being further upgraded to a new K-74M2 variant, designed to be fired from the Su-57's side weapon bays. This variant reportedly includes a lock-on after launch (LOAL) capability, meaning that the missile can be launched without guidance and it will acquire its target once in flight.

If the reports about the R-74M2 variant are correct, it would make sense to use it aboard the Okhotnik, as the IR sensor of the missile can't achieve a lock before launch while it is inside the weapon bays, unless there is a mechanism that extends the missile launcher into the airstream during the targeting process. In that case, the LOAL capability would not be essential and the UCAV could also use the standard R-74 and R-73.

Regarding the R-77, considered to be the Russian counterpart of the AIM-120 AMRAAM, the missile is currently being tested in a specially designed variant for the Su-57, called R-77M. This missile, based on the upgraded R-77-1/AA-12B currently in service on the Su-27SM, Su-30SM and Su-35S (and according to some sources also on earlier Su-27s and MiG-29, although there is no photographic evidence of its use in operational role), has been redesigned to fit inside the weapon bays, with the main difference being the replacement of the grid fins on the missile's tail with standard fins.

The missile should include a dual-pulse rocket motor for improved high-altitude maneuvering and extended range (rumored up to 100 miles, doubling the range of previous variants), an enhanced AESA radar sensor, improved Electronic Counter-Countermeasures(ECCM), better aerodynamics and reduced radar cross section (the last two mainly due to the new fins). With all these characteristics and the design optimized to fit inside the weapon bays, the R-77M could be the main candidate to be carried by the S-70.

There are also reports about another variant of the Adder, called R-77PD, which is powered by a combined rocket-ramjet engine, much like the European MBDA Meteor BVRAAM (Beyond Visual Range Air-to-Air Missile). Details about this variant are scarce and it is not known if it will be acquired by the Russian Aerospace Forces.

The commonality of the weapons between the S-70 and the Su-57 could be another hint to the future role of the UCAV. In the past, the Russian government said the drone would extend the radar coverage of the Felon and provide target acquisition, while also being able to attack its own targets autonomously. The Russian Ministry of Defense expects the first deliveries of the drone to happen in 2024, so we will likely know more about its role as we get closer to that deadline.

According to some sources, the Okhotnik could perform live air-to-air missile launches this year, this has not been confirmed. However, it would not be the first time for a drone, as the MQ-9 Reaper already fired live AIM-9X Sidewinder missiles in 2017 and 2020 and, even before, the MQ-1 Predator launched the AIM-92 ATAS (Air-to-Air Stinger), including one fired in 2002 at an Iraqi MiG-25.

Chinese Covid-19 Vaccine Far Less Effective Than Initially Touted in Brazil

Results of Sinovac's shot were almost 30 percentage points lower than previously announced, as concerns grow over study's transparency

SÃO PAULO—China's effort to boost its image by providing Covid-19 vaccines to the developing world suffered a setback after one of its leading inoculation candidates turned out to be 50% effective in late-stage trials in Brazil, significantly lower than earlier results showed.

While Sinovac's CoronaVac efficacy rate still meets the 50% threshold the World Health Organization considers good enough for widespread use, scientists said a lack of transparency about the data risks damaging the credibility of a vaccine Brazilians and others world-wide are already reluctant to take.

Brazil's Butantan Institute, a São Paulo-based public institute that is the first to complete late-stage trials of the CoronaVac vaccine, had said last week that it was shown to be 78% effective and offer total protection against severe cases of the disease.

But after rising pressure from Brazilian scientists, some of whom accused the trial's organizers of misleading the public, Butantan said Tuesday those rates only included volunteers who suffered mild to severe cases of Covid-19. When data from all volunteers was considered—including those who contracted "very mild" cases of Covid-19 and required no medical assistance—the total efficacy rate fell to 50.4%, Butantan said.

Sinovac didn't respond to requests for comment.

From Latin America to Africa and Asia, many developing countries have pinned their hopes on CoronaVac and other Chinese vaccine candidates as richer nations snap up inoculations developed in the West. CoronaVac can be stored in an ordinary refrigerator, making it cheaper and easier to transport than others that require subfreezing storage temperatures.

"This will have profound implications domestically [in China] and internationally," said Yanzhong Huang, a senior fellow for global health at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. "From the very beginning, China has raised people's expectations about the effectiveness of China-made vaccines."

Beyond mainland China and Hong Kong, Turkey and Ukraine are among nations that have reported orders for CoronaVac, and where regulators would also be closely watching for efficacy analysis. Brazil has agreed to buy up to 100 million doses, and seven other Latin American countries have been in talks to obtain the vaccine.

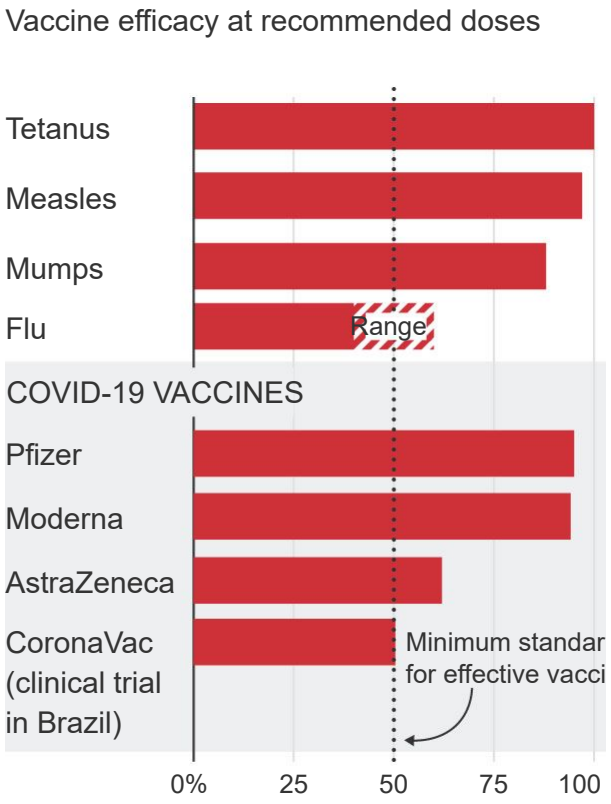
Sinovac and Butantan had initially scheduled to reveal the efficacy rate by Dec. 15 but delayed it a week, citing a decision to collect additional data. A week later, the announcement was delayed again, which Brazilian researchers attributed to Sinovac's request for more time to consolidate data from trials in Indonesia and Turkey.

"It's extremely unusual, I've never seen this," said Denise Garrett, an epidemiologist at the Washington-based Sabin Vaccine Institute who worked for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta for more than 20 years. "They had already delayed the results—it seems they found them to be unsatisfactory so they came up with a way to announce the results in a more favorable way," she said.



Sources: State of Sao Paulo (CoronaVac); the companies (Covid-19 vaccines); Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (other vaccines)

The lower success rate could push governments toward giving priority to purchases from drugmakers whose vaccines have higher efficacy rates, said Iván Darío Vélez, an infectious disease expert at Colombia's University of Antioquia.

"If the vaccine has an efficacy rate around 50%, it's going to be hard to justify including it in the national vaccination program," said Dr. Vélez. "But if we have a society that doesn't have the means to acquire all of the vaccines it needs, you can see a scenario where authorities would say, 'Fifty percent protection is still better than nothing.'"

In Chile, officials said they would go ahead with plans to import some 10 million doses of the Sinovac vaccine, the first batch of which was expected this month, said Rodrigo Yáñez, a high-ranking official in the Foreign Relations Ministry in charge of importing the shots.

Mr. Yáñez said CoronaVac would still be effective in preventing deaths and overwhelming hospitals with Covid-19 patients. "That is the objective," he said.

Many flu vaccines have an efficacy rate even lower than that of CoronaVac, public-health specialists said.

As China brought Covid-19 under control last year, the country's vaccine developers turned to foreign nations to conduct their clinical trials, choosing Brazil, Indonesia and Turkey. The widely differing results from those countries have only raised more questions about how well the vaccine works.

In countries with high numbers of Covid-19 cases, volunteers in vaccine trials face a greater exposure to the virus, allowing researchers to test vaccines faster and produce more accurate results. More than 200,000 people have died from Covid-19 in Brazil so far, second only to the U.S., turning the Latin American country into an ideal testing ground for vaccines.

Researchers in Turkey, which is at an earlier stage of testing CoronaVac, said late last month that initial data from around 1,300 people in late-stage trials showed the vaccine to be just over 91% effective.

Meanwhile, Indonesian authorities reported Monday that preliminary results from their clinical trial of CoronaVac showed an efficacy rate of 65.3%, although it isn't clear how scientists there made their calculations.

Though that rate was based on data from a trial involving just 1,600 volunteers in the city of Bandung, Indonesian authorities this week greenlighted CoronaVac for emergency use. It isn't clear whether Indonesian authorities knew the full extent of the data analysis from Brazil. The country has secured 126 million doses of the vaccine, batches of which have already arrived.

In contrast, more than 12,000 health workers took part in Phase 3 trials in Brazil, the first country to complete tests of Sinovac's vaccine. Of those volunteers, 252 contracted Covid-19—167 of whom took the placebo, and 85 of whom took the vaccine, the Butantan Institute said Tuesday.

Butantan researchers on Tuesday defended their decision to release partial results first, saying that it is more important to know how well the vaccine protects people against more severe cases rather than all cases.

CoronaVac's relatively low efficacy rate means more people will need to take the vaccine to achieve herd immunity, making it even more important for its developers to be transparent and reassure the public about its efficacy and safety, doctors said.

Infectious disease specialists blamed the skewed results on both pressure from São Paulo's government and Sinovac in China.

Political observers here say that São Paulo's Gov. João Doria, who spearheaded Butantan's partnership with Sinovac, has politicized the vaccine's development by championing its use in his increasingly public tussle with President Jair Bolsonaro, who has long disparaged Chinese vaccines. Mr. Doria is considered a likely presidential candidate next year.

In November, Mr. Bolsonaro warned his followers that the CoronaVac vaccine could kill or disable them, without offering any evidence. Mr. Bolsonaro, who last year recovered from a mild case of Covid-19, has dismissed the disease as nothing more than a “little flu” and said he doesn’t plan to get vaccinated himself.

Battling politicians coupled with the mixed signals about the Sinovac vaccine led 50% of respondents in a Datafolha poll conducted last month to say they wouldn’t take any Chinese vaccine. When respondents were asked if they would get vaccinated, knowing vaccines are produced by many countries, only 20% said they would not.

“It’s absurd,” Sonia Nascimento, a 46-year-old caregiver for the elderly, said about the confusion over the vaccine’s efficacy rate. “Is this vaccine going to work? Should I wait for more people to take it in case it has side effects?”

While Butantan has found itself caught in a political battle in Brazil, its Chinese partners imposed strict controls on what information could be publicly shared.

“Butantan found itself squashed between them in the middle of all this mess,” said Eliseu Waldman, an epidemiologist at the University of São Paulo, who like many specialists has defended the 120-year-old institution. Butantan produces the majority of vaccines used in the country and is in talks to distribute CoronaVac throughout South America.

Hours after Butantan announced CoronaVac to be between 78% and 100% effective last Thursday, Brazil’s federal government announced it would buy up to 100 million doses of the vaccine.

Chinese authorities approved CoronaVac for emergency use last July but have yet to approve the vaccine for broad use. The Council on Foreign Relations’ Mr. Huang says the lower efficacy figure doesn’t preclude China from still allowing the vaccine to be used widely.

Iran Is Assembling Gear Able to Produce Key Nuclear-Weapons Material

Iran has taken a significant new step toward possible atomic-weapons production, starting work on an assembly line to manufacture a key material used at the core of nuclear warheads, the United Nations atomic agency said in a confidential report Wednesday, raising the stakes in Tehran's standoff with Washington ahead of President-elect Joe Biden's inauguration.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, in a report for member states viewed by The Wall Street Journal, said Iran has told the watchdog that it has started manufacturing equipment it will use to produce uranium metal at a site in Isfahan in coming months.

Uranium metal can be used to construct the core of a nuclear weapon.

Iran hasn't made uranium metal so far, senior Western officials said. The IAEA said Tehran had given it no timeline for when it would do so. Still, the development brings Iran closer to crossing the line between nuclear operations with a potential civilian use, such as enriching nuclear fuel for power-generating reactors, and nuclear-weapons work, something Tehran has long denied ever carrying out.

Iran's ambassador to the IAEA, Kazem Gharib Abadi, said Wednesday on Twitter that Iran would produce uranium metal, saying it would allow the development of a new fuel for the Tehran civilian research reactor. Iran has said it would take four to five months to install the equipment to produce a uranium powder from which uranium metal is made.

The Iranian government has moved methodically over the past 18 months to expand its nuclear activities. Since the Trump administration withdrew from a 2015 international accord limiting Iranian nuclear activities and began imposing sweeping economic sanctions, Iran has begun stockpiling more enriched uranium and taken other steps barred under the nuclear deal.

Making uranium metal is also prohibited by the deal, which also involves the U.K., France, Germany, China and Russia.

Mr. Biden has said he wants to resume diplomacy with Iran and is looking for a way to return to the nuclear agreement, which was reached when he was vice president. But reviving the international pact could be complicated politically and for technical reasons, and could face stiffer opposition if Iran conducts nuclear weapons-related work.

Western diplomats say that by taking the recent steps, Iran is seeking leverage to pressure Mr. Biden to move swiftly to drop sanctions on Iran and return speedily to the nuclear accord without laying down any conditions. By threatening major new steps on uranium metal production and scaling back U.N. inspectors' access to Iran, Tehran could leave Mr. Biden with a difficult choice—a rapid return to the deal or a major confrontation between the U.S. and Iran.

IRAN'S NUCLEAR PROGRAM

How Close Is Tehran to Developing Nuclear Weapons?

After the killing of leading Iranian nuclear scientist Mohsen Fakhrizadeh —in an attack Tehran has blamed on Israel—Iran's parliament in December called on the government to start enriching uranium up to 20% purity and to begin producing uranium metal within five months if the U.S. doesn't drop its economic sanctions. Israel has declined to comment on the killing of Mr. Fakhrizadeh. Iran said last week it was starting to produce 20% enriched uranium.

Under the 2015 nuclear deal, Iran had agreed to a 15-year moratorium on uranium and plutonium metallurgical production. Iran was allowed to work on advanced fuel for research reactors, one of the few civilian uses for uranium metal, but only after 10 years.

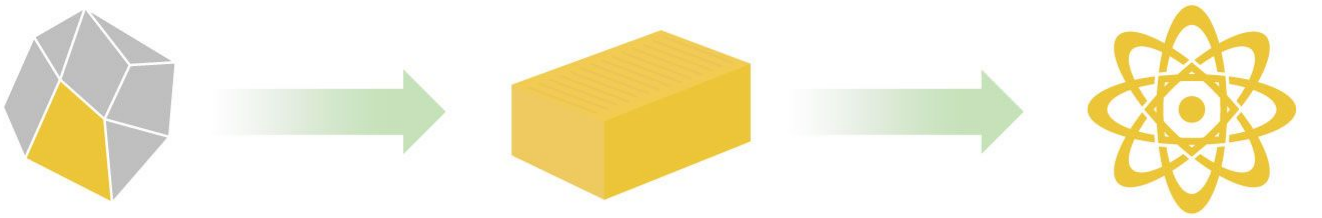
When enriched to weapons grade of roughly 90% purity, uranium metal plays a central role in atomic weapons, forming the core of the device which, when triggered, sets off a chain reaction that creates the nuclear explosion.

Making a Nuclear Weapon

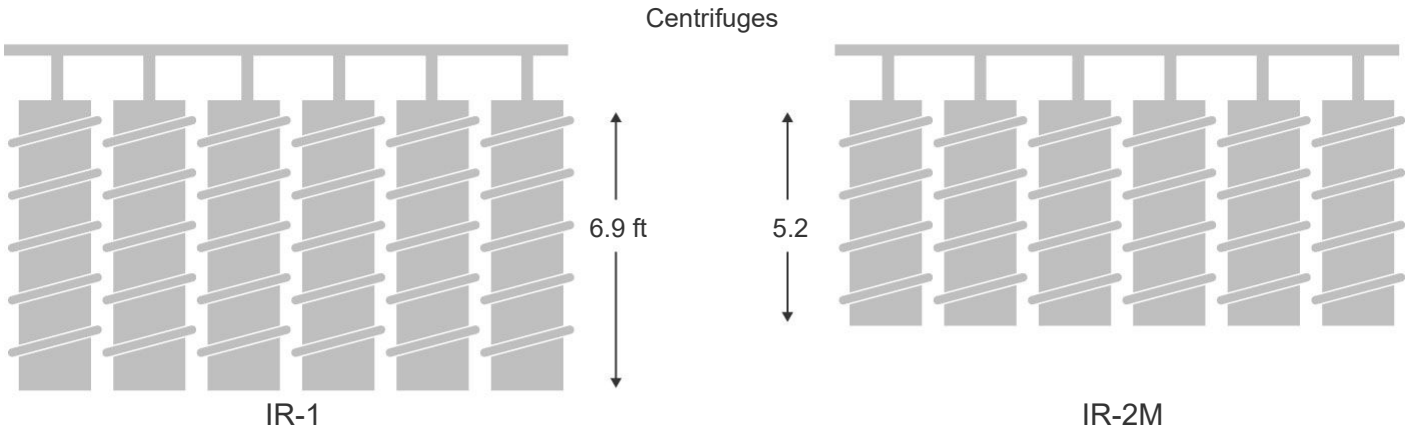
Iran has taken early steps that could possibly allow it to build a nuclear weapon.

Creating weapons-grade nuclear fuel

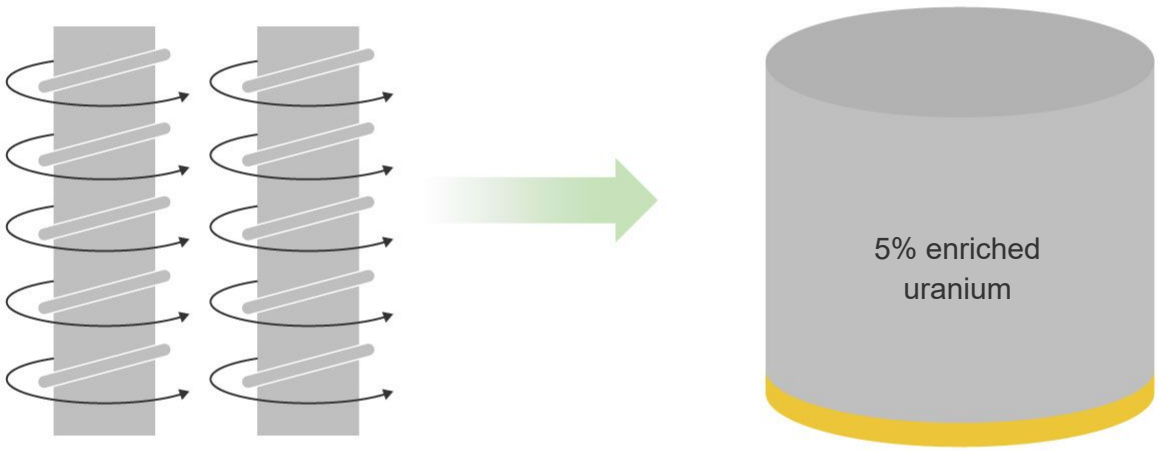
1 Low-grade uranium ore is mined and chemically treated to produce a concentrated yellowcake. After a conversion process, it is fed into centrifuges.



2 Centrifuges are set up in cascades to enrich the uranium. The sophisticated process can take years to establish. Iran produced around 20,000 basic centrifuges—IR-1s and IR-2ms—but is doing research on more advanced machines.



3 Enriching uranium to 5% purity is the most time-consuming part of producing weapons-grade material. Since the Trump administration left the 2015 nuclear agreement in 2018, Iran has accrued a stockpile of at least 2,443 kg of uranium, including material enriched to 3.67% and 4.5%. The size of the stockpile is more than 12 times the total permitted under the accord.



4 It takes roughly 200 kg to 250 kg of 20% enriched uranium to produce 25 kg of 90% enriched uranium, the amount needed for a bomb. In early January, Iran began enriching uranium at 20% for the first time since the 2015 nuclear deal. Enriched uranium can be converted into uranium metal for weapon use.

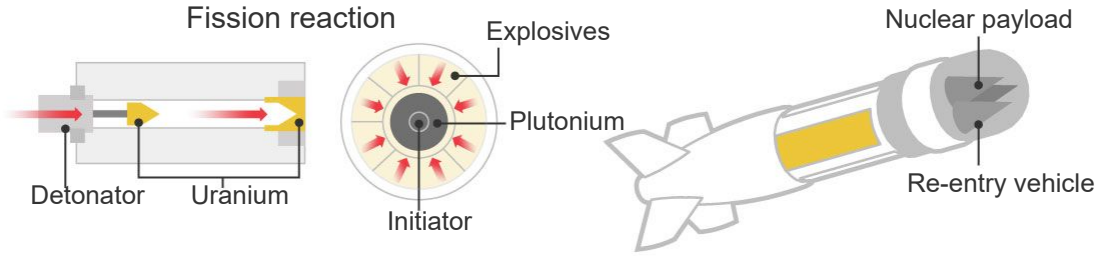
Weaponizing nuclear fuel

Iran has signaled it could begin building a uranium metal plant that would give it the material to make the core of a nuclear weapon. Deploying the nuclear fuel in a weapon presents technical challenges, many of which Iran isn't believed to have mastered. Detonating the weapon requires a fission reaction. The nuclear payload must be attached to a missile, and the payload must be able to withstand re-entry through Earth's atmosphere as it descends to its target.



Roque Ruiz/THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

Even with the production of uranium metal, Iran would need to complete many additional steps before it is capable of building a nuclear-tipped intercontinental ballistic missile. It would need to be able to build a warhead compact enough to be carried on such a missile and manufacture a re-entry vehicle to prevent the weapon from exploding in flight.

Iran may still need years to master those skills, some analysts believe.

Iran has denied ever working on nuclear weapons, but Western officials and the IAEA have said Tehran had a structured weapons program until 2003. And the IAEA has for years pursued leads about the Iranians' work on uranium materials.

Over the past year, the IAEA has sought to locate a natural uranium-metal disc, present in Iran in the early 2000s, which is no longer accounted for. That led to a protracted standoff, which saw IAEA inspectors banned from visiting two Iranian sites for months.

The IAEA said in a report in 2013 that Iran had told the agency it intended to build a facility to produce uranium-metal ingots, but it was widely believed a production line was never completed.

According to Western officials, the work on the new Iranian uranium-metal production line is being done by a company called Sureh, a subsidiary of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, which is currently under U.S. sanctions and was previously sanctioned by the European Union for its nuclear-related work.

The work is taking place at an Iranian nuclear facility in Isfahan, near the Uranium Conversion Facility, which is under regular IAEA inspection.

Some Western officials have said Iran has worked for several years on research to pave the way to being able to produce uranium metal.

Large bitcoin payment made to far-right individuals before U.S. Capitol attack: report By Reuters Staff (Reuters) - Payments in bitcoin worth more than $500,000 were made to 22 different virtual wallets, most of them belonging to far-right activists and internet personalities, before the storming of the U.S. Capitol, cryptocurrency compliance startup Chainalysis said on Friday.

The payments, made by a French donor, of 28.15 bitcoins were made on Dec. 8, the New York-based startup, specializing in countering money laundering and fraud in the digital currency space, said in a blog post. (bit.ly/3bG83yE)

Chainalysis said it now has evidence that many alt-right groups and personalities received large bitcoin donations as part of the single transaction.

“We have also gathered evidence that strongly suggests the donor was a now-deceased computer programmer based in France,” Chainalysis said in the report.

Nick Fuentes, who was permanently suspended from YouTube last year for hate speech, received 13.5 bitcoins, worth about $250,000 at the time of the transfer, making him by far the biggest beneficiary of the donation, according to the blog post.

Fuentes could not be reached for a request for comment.

FEMA Releases "Coronavirus Disease (COVID-19) Initial Assessment Report"

FEMA releases its "Coronavirus Disease (COVID-19) Initial Assessment Report < Caution-https://lnks.gd/l/eyJhbGciOiJIUzI1NiJ9.eyJidWxsZXRpbl9saW5rX2lkIjoxMDAsInVyaSI6ImJwMjpjbGljayIsImJ1bGxldGluX2lkIjoiMjAyMTAxMTUuMzM0MDc3MzEiLCJ1cmwiOiJodHRwczovL3d3dy5mZW1hLmdvdi9kaXNhc3RlcnMvY29yb25hdmlydXMifQ.rDLhV8fqWPw32a7YudbKORQY6naebmQ6O7y1KC-4ex8/s/559065462/br/93190490040-l > " which assesses the agency's initial response to the global pandemic.

Highlighted items in the report show the challenges the agency faced, including needing to clarify roles and authorities between responding agencies and managing complex interagency coordination while still protecting its own workforce. The report covers FEMA's response from mid-March through Sept. 30, 2020 and provides 32 key findings and 57 recommendations in five areas.

FEMA partnered with the private sector, non-governmental organizations and other federal agencies to better manage the complex logistical operations. To drastically speed up the arrival of medical supplies and personal protective equipment (PPE) to the domestic market, FEMA chartered privately owned planes for medical distributors, reducing the transit time between manufacturer and customer from 30–45 days via ocean freight to approximately five days via air freight. Project Airbridge chartered 249 flights over a span of 92 days and delivered roughly 1.73 billion units of personal protective equipment (PPE) and medical supplies to prioritized areas.

While coordinating the federal COVID-19 response, FEMA responded to multiple disasters. The year 2020 was the most active Atlantic hurricane season in history with 25 named Atlantic Ocean storms, three of which were declared major disasters across seven states.

FEMA's COVID-19 operations led to innovations for coordination with government and non-government partners on implementing national distribution networks and innovative solutions to data management and analysis and manufacturing and procuring scarce resources. The agency's adaptive workforce enabled it to facilitate an effective operational response to the pandemic.

The report findings and recommendations will be used to inform FEMA and the emergency management community and improve existing and future responses to pandemics. The Initial Assessment Report represents part of FEMA’s continuous improvement process, helping the agency learn faster and to communicate to the emergency management community where there are opportunities to build greater capacity.

Russia Defends "Protectorate" in Central African Republic as Rebels Advance

France has historically been the major Western power guaranteeing political stability in the Francophone countries of northwest and central Africa. However, Turkey has increasingly matched French influence in North Africa, while the United States, to an extent, has done the same in Niger and perhaps Rwanda (France24 < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=da7527260d&e=ebf6228344 > , December 24, 2020). While Russia provides weapons to various Francophone countries, it has also become the protector of the Central African Republic (CAR). Prior to this, France had been the most influential foreign power in CAR and neighboring countries, including, for example, Chad, where Paris has consistently "propped up" its three decades-long President Idriss Déby (rfi.fr < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=f7da22a68b&e=ebf6228344 > , March 20, 2019).

Islamic State Sinai Province Targets Egypt-Israel Gas Pipeline

Jacob Zenn

Since February 2018, Egypt has waged an intense counter-insurgency against Islamic State (IS) Sinai Province (Arab News < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=10fad3c48d&e=ebf6228344 > , December 25, 2020). Despite this, Sinai Province has claimed more attacks than any other IS external province except for Islamic State in West Africa Province (ISWAP). Sinai Province attacks have included firing mortars at Egyptian military posts and ambushing Egyptian troops,

However, one of the more geopolitically significant types of attack has been Sinai Province's targeting of the gas pipeline that extends from the province into Israel. Three have occurred this year, including on February 3, November 19, and, most recently, on December 26 near Sabika in North Sinai. This is west of al-Arish and around 30 miles from Rafah in the Gaza Strip. When IS claimed the latest pipeline attack, the group unsurprisingly stated Sinai Province's motive was to disrupt the pipeline because it is connected to Israel. The attack was not particularly effective because it did not disrupt gas supply, civilians' housing, or the nearby industrial park (Egypttoday.com < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=83bd62d069&e=ebf6228344 > , December 24, 2020).

American "Boojahideen": The Boogaloo Bois' Blueprint for Extreme Libertarianism and Response to the Biden Administration

Angela Ramirez

The Boogaloo Bois is a recently formed decentralized armed movement comprised of loosely knit cells scattered throughout the United States. Boogaloo participants have also been involved in several attacks and plots, including the attempted kidnapping of Michigan's governor, an attempt to sell weapons to Hamas, and a deadly attack on a federal security officer in northern California. The movement is centered on participants' belief that the U.S. government has become excessively tyrannical. Participants, therefore, have concluded that a second civil war is unfortunate, but inevitable, in order to obtain "true liberty." The movement refers to this idealized second civil war as "the Boogaloo" (Spotify [Buck Johsnon] < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=4d04773589&e=ebf6228344 > , July 2020). Occasionally, the word "Boogaloo" is exchanged for slang terms, however, such as "the big luau," the "Bungalow," or the "Big Igloo."

Boko Haram's Pan-Nigerian Affiliate System after the Kankara Kidnapping: A Microcosm of Islamic State's 'External Provinces'

Jacob Zenn

On December 11, 2020, around 300 male students were kidnapped from a Kankara, Katsina State school in northwestern Nigeria (TheCable < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=cf1a5fa904&e=ebf6228344 > , December 13, 2020). The attack was inconsistent with typical northwestern Nigeria banditry operations involving smaller-scale kidnapping and extortion, pillaging, and assassination of local political enemies that have escalated in northwestern Nigerian in recent years. The attack was, however, consistent with the past activities of the Boko Haram faction led by Abubakar Shekau. Shekau's faction is responsible for the mass killing of male students in their dormitories in 2013 and the Chibok kidnapping of more than 200 female students in Borno State, northeastern Nigeria in 2014. Furthermore, the Kankara kidnapping reflected Boko Haram's "affiliate system" because the attack was conducted by Boko Haram's northwestern Nigerian "affiliate" in the Katsina-Niger-Zamfara state axis, which is comprised primarily of bandits ("Niger" refers to Niger State, Nigeria, not the Republic of Niger).

Inside Duterte's Failed Response to the Philippines' Communist Insurgency and the Appeal of New People's Army among Indigenous Peoples

Jack Broome

On December 7, 2020, following speculation in the news, the Philippines President Rodrigo Duterte finally announced that the government would not offer a holiday ceasefire—as is tradition for this time of year—to the New People's Army (NPA), the armed wing of the Communist Party of the Philippines (CPP). Duterte's announcement came during his weekly address to the nation on the government's response to the COVID-19 pandemic, but Duterte went one step further by Good afternoon. Thank you very much to Vanderbilt Law School and in particular to the Vanderbilt Journal of Entertainment & Technology Law for hosting this event. I love Vanderbilt and I love Nashville, and I'm sorry not to be there in person with you today. Someday when COVID-19 is a memory and social distancing is something you do only with people you don't like, I look forward to returning to Nashville and reconnecting with many of my old friends there. More importantly, I look forward to returning to some of my favorite honky-tonks and showing off my famous dance moves. I've been practicing at home in my free time, to make sure I'm ready.

January 15, 2021

Dear BRS Stakeholder,

The U.S. Department of Agricultures (USDA) Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service (APHIS) is announcing the deregulation of a cotton variety [Caution-https://www.aphis.usda.gov/aphis/newsroom/stakeholder-info/sa_by_date/sa-2021/sa-01/ge-cotton], designated as MON 88702, developed by the Monsanto Company (Monsanto) using genetic engineering for resistance to certain insects, primarily tarnished plant bugs ("Lygus "species)

As part of the petition process, APHIS prepared a draft plant pest risk assessment (PPRA) and draft environmental assessment (EA), and made these documents available for a 30-day public review and comment period on October 16, 2020.

APHIS considered all public comments and conducted a thorough review of the potential environmental impacts in its final EA pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA), reaching a finding of no significant impact (FONSI).

APHIS concluded in its final PPRA that the MON 88702 cotton variety is unlikely to pose a plant pest risk to agricultural crops or other plants in the United States and is deregulating it effective January 19, 2021.

(U//FOUO) The Violent Extremism[*] Snapshot (VES) is intended to provide highlights of violent extremist content online in the U.S. and abroad. The Central Florida Intelligence Exchange (CFIX) bases its analysis in this report on information gathered from open source reporting, which includes internet and social media postings, with varying degrees of reliability. Unless specifically noted, the social media reporting in this product originated from users whose affiliation and credibility are unknown and are included for the purpose of providing broad trends in online behavior and situational awareness for federal, state, local, tribal, and territorial counterterrorism and law enforcement officials and private sector security partners.

(U) The information in this document is current as of 14 January 2021.

(U) First Amendment Acknowledgement

(U) The CFIX recognizes that Americans have constitutionally protected rights to assemble, speak, and petition the government. The CFIX safeguards these first amendment rights, and reports on only those activities where the potential use of rhetoric and/or propaganda could be used to incite violent or criminal acts. Additionally, potential criminality exhibited by certain members of a group does not negate the constitutional rights of the group itself or its law-abiding participants to exercise their individual liberties under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

* The FBI and NCTC define "Violent Extremism" as encouraging, condoning, justifying, or supporting the commission of a violent act to achieve political, ideological, religious, social, or economic goals. In a domestic context, violent extremism refers to the furtherance of political or social goals wholly or in part through activities involving force or violence and in potential violation of criminal law as distinct from the lawful and constitutionally protected pursuit of these objectives.

CFIX VIOLENT EXTREMISM SNAPSHOT

(U//FOUO) Domestic Violent Extremists (DVEs) Migrate to Alternative Social Media Platforms – In response to the 6 January 2021 breach of the U.S. Capitol, big tech companies such as Twitter and Facebook began deplatforming individuals and groups en masse. This included the removal of Parler from Amazon's server hosting service. In an effort to avoid censorship and maintain their online presence, DVEs of varying ideologies began migrating to existing alternative platforms such as MeWe, Telegram, Gab, Clouthub, Minds, and TikTok. Popular message boards such as 4chan and 8kun also experienced an increase in users. For encrypted communications, Signal Messenger and ProtonMail are being used. Analyst Note* – *For additional information on MeWe and Minds, please see CFIX Open Source Intelligence Bulletin titled "Violent Extremists and Other Threat Groups Use MeWe as an Alternative to Facebook and Use of Minds Crypto Social Network as an Alternative Platform by Violent Extremists".

(U//FOUO) Boogaloo Online Networks – With the arrest of several individuals affiliated with the Boogaloo movement in 2020, many social media platforms began to remove any Booglaoo-related individuals, groups and hashtags. As a result, these individuals began migrating to alternative platforms and can currently be found on Telegram, MeWe, Minds, and TikTok. Prior to its removal, Parler, had become very popular with individuals supporting the Boogaloo. Although Twitter did remove an extensive number of Boogaloo related accounts in 2020, CFIX has observed a growing number of Boogaloo related accounts and hashtags on this platform. On TikTok, Boogaloo related accounts are still active; however, are more difficult to locate due to being shadowbanned. Analyst Note* – *When a channel is shadowbanned, the content is blocked and a name and/or hashtag search will bring back no results. The shadowbanning has no effect on subscribers of the channel. Additionally, new users are still able to locate and join these channels by clicking hashtags shared by other TikTok users they have subscribed to.

(U//FOUO) Boogaloo Related News Site Gets Rickrolled – Boogaloo networks on Twitter have been sharing the website URL "treeofliberty.me" which currently redirects users to a YouTube music video for the 1987 Rick Astley song "Never Gonna Give You Up" instead of the intended website. The Tree of Liberty website is described as a "non-profit inside source for news related to the Boogaloo" with a section dedicated to providing up-to-date information and downloadable material for January 17th armed protests at the state capitols.

(U//FOUO) White Racially or Ethnically Motivated Extremists (WRMVEs) Hit with "Telegram Purge" – In response to the migration of DVEs to alternative platforms, Telegram has again come under scrutiny for its continued hosting of violent extremist channels. This has resulted in the removal of several prominent accelerationist WRMVE channels that identify as part of the Terrorgram network. Many of these channels have been active 1-2 years and had thousands of followers. In response to these suspensions, channel admins have encouraged everyone to archive their favorite channels. They have also been creating back-up/clone channels so they can quickly resume their activities. At this time it appears that these account removals are a result of a coordinated effort by individuals to report these channels rather than Telegram proactively removing the channels for violating their Terms of Use. Analyst Note – For additional information on how WRMVEs operate on Telegram, please see CFIX Open Source Intelligence Bulletin titled "Use of Telegram by White Supremacist Extremists".*

(U//FOUO) DVE's Create Black Flag Depicting Ashli Babbit[USPER] –DVEs across various social media platforms have shared a flag that was created to memorialize the events that occurred on 6 January at the U.S. Capitol. Ashli Babbit is described "the martyr that was shot in the neck" which is represented on the flag with the drop of blood. The four stars represent "the 4 Martyrs" that were killed at the Capitol and the background depicts that the event took place at the Capitol where blood was spilled. Many DVE's are using this as a battle flag and have encouraged any future actions be done under the banner of this flag. Many Boogaloo affiliated accounts on Twitter are urging followers to "raise the black flag" or "fly the black flag" along with posting .gifs of black flags or incorporating the black flag emoji (🏴) into their posts or profile descriptions. On various platforms, many anti-Government Violent Extremist (AGVE) and WRMVE are using this flag as their profile photos.

(U//FOUO) WRMVEs Encourage Followers to Live Stream Attacks – Following the January 6th breech of the U.S. Capitol, prominent WRMVE Telegram channels have mentioned livestreaming while inciting violent actions. In one post, subscribers of the channel were told that they were the new "jihadi john" and that like Jihadi John, they would need a rifle, a camera and fanaticism. However, they would also have some things that Jihadi John didn't, such as a livestream, a place on the Saints leaderboard, and a victory. Another prominent WRMVE channel provided a scenario where an individual lives in a Democratic Midwest town or a town with a "traitorous" Republican as mayor. It was suggested that the Mayor be killed on livestream. If the Sheriff tries to get involved, it was suggested that he/she be killed as well. Analyst Note – WRMVEs frequently include the phrase "[REDACTED]" in their posts to circumvent threatening terminology.*

CFIX VIOLENT EXTREMISM SNAPSHOT

(U//FOUO) WRMVEs Post Veiled Threats to Politicians – Following the January 6th breech of the U.S. Capitol, WRMVEs have identified politicians as one of the greatest enemies. It has been suggested that instead of attending inauguration protests in Washington D.C. on 20 January, "smart ones" would instead exploit the divided attention and attack in other places. It was mentioned that politicians have family outside of Washington D.C. that should be "open for more professional ops". Another post that was shared extensively on WRMVE Telegram channels also commented that these politicians "have homes in your own states" that individuals can loot and burn and "they have families too". Supporters were encouraged to "make the statement loud and clear that WE ARE EVERYWHERE".

(U//FOUO) WRMVEs Suggest Sabotaging Retail Businesses – A WRMVE Telegram Channel posted a message suggesting that retail businesses be targeted as a means to "collapse their system strategically". The author of the post stated: "In (Minecraft) all major commercial retail businesses are Jewish owned or heavily contribute to the Kike system that enslaves us. Small acts of sabotage over and over can financially ruin huge corporations. Find out who these companies support/employ/donate to and act accordingly. If they cannot operate profitable businesses they will slowly lose control of power". Analyst Note* – *WRMVEs frequently use 'in Minecraft' as a coded reference for violent or criminal actions that are suggested or intended to take place in the real world.

GNET: Attack dates also have significance for reinforcing the identity of far-right groups, like the ones that stormed the US capital on 6 January 2021

By Dr. Carol Winkler
15th January 2021
In Insights

In the aftermath of the violent political events of 6 January 2021 at the US Capitol, a cascade of governmental officials, political pundits, media commentators, and scholars repeatedly stressed the notion that a President's words matter. The oft-repeated litany of Donald J. Trump calling on his supporters to "stand back and stand by" during a presidential debate, to descend on Washington, D.C. for a "wild" protest on 6 January 2021, and to "not take it any longer" and "fight like hell" immediately before his supporters stormed the US Capitol replayed over and over on traditional media outlets, online news sources, and on social media and culminated in the impeachment of the President.

While the words of national leaders do matter, the dates of planned attacks also have symbolic significance for violent extremist groups and their followers. Dates play an important role in constituting extremist groups, including those that seek to pursue political objectives through violence. Key event dates draw together individuals with common beliefs, attitudes, and behavioural tendencies that might otherwise fail to recognise their affiliation and connection. In short, as Myres (2018) noted, groups "are not born, nor do they die; their fate lies in the redistribution of their name across a network of signifiers." The dates serve as condensation symbols that emphasise the timeless nature of the groups and their ideological perspectives. The historic connections also imply that even if a group suffers temporary setbacks in the contemporary environment, the lasting nature of their identity formation assures ultimate victory (Charland, 1987).

Attacks dates often function as coded references for the ideological underpinnings of extremist groups. On the international stage, al-Qaeda and Islamic State (IS), for example, have planned and/or carried out attacks on Christian religious holidays to underscore the centrality of their Muslim identity. On Christmas day in 2009, al-Qaeda operative Umar Farouk attempted to down a Northwest Airliner travelling to Detroit, Michigan, while IS-inspired militants have carried out fatal attacks on the Berlin Christmas market, Palm Sunday attacks in Tanta, Egypt, and Easter Sunday attacks in Sri Lanka, to name but a few. The religious importance of the Christian holiday attacks draws heightened attention to the vulnerability of collectives that oppose the cause of extremist groups.

Attack dates also have significance for reinforcing the identity of far-right groups, like the ones that stormed the US capital on 6 January 2021. Take, for example, the current FBI warning about upcoming 17 January 2021 planned attacks by the Boogaloo Bois on federal and state capitols (Dickson, 2021). The 17 January date has historical importance to the Boogaloo movement because of the Davis-Coke controversy in 1874. Edmund J. Davis and Richard Coke were political adversaries in the 1873 Texas Gubernatorial contest. Coke, a Democrat who had previously served in the Confederate Fifteenth Texas Infantry and who had voted in the statehouse for the Texas secession from the union, received twice the number of votes in the election as Davis. Yet, Davis barricaded himself in his office and refused to transfer power to Coke because of a state Supreme Court ruling that rejected the election results due to rampant irregularities and fraud on both sides of the electoral contest. Davis requested federal assistance from President Ulysses S. Grant to protect his claim on the governorship, but none was forthcoming. Coke's supporters used ladders to enter the Texas statehouse and axes to breach the Governor's office (as Davis had fled with whiskey). After their successful occupation, the Democrats would go on to control the Texas statehouse for the next century, effectively ending radical reconstruction efforts (Bishop, [n.d.]; Moneyhon, 1980; Noe, 2016).

Using the attack date as a code for the Coke-Davis controversy functions in several important ways to bolster the cause of the Boogaloo Bois. First, it reinforces the contemporary narrative that American elections are rife with fraud and unworthy of their members' trust. Second, it intimates that the court system has long been biased in favour of those who oppose white supremacy, with the implied conclusion that opinions of the course today should not have authoritative sway over group members. Third, it warrants the use of property destruction and forced entry to obtain the group's "just" cause. Fourth, it underscores that with unity, the cause of the Boogaloo movement not only wins the day in the short-term, but proffers the group's dominance for decades to come. Finally, it provides an imaginary anecdote to the certified results of a recent state of Georgia election where a state generally considered to be a lock for conservative causes elected its first Black senator and the first black Democratic senator from a southern state in a US election.

Other dates associated with the planned attacks of far-right support groups of President Trump also demonstrate the need to consider the implications of the attack dates carefully. While the first attack date of 6 January aligned with the certification of the 2020 Presidential election results, it simultaneously recalled when the Three Wisemen visited Jesus particularly for Orthodox Catholic and Anglican Christians. The multiple meanings of the 6 January date signaled the expansion of the fighting coalition likely planning to storm the capitol to evangelical adherents.

What the incidents described here make clear is that those interested in understanding and being able to better predict attacks by extremist groups need to pay special attention to any announced dates of the planned attacks. They should also identify historical dates of significance to extremist groups that might portend attacks even when they are not amplified on social media. Once identified, analysts should look beyond a specified date as a simple rubric for revealing the timing of the intended attack. Such information viewed historically can also give insights into the likely makeup of the coalescing group, the motivations of those participating, and the tactics the group might employ.

COG NCRPortal SharePoint Access Instructions v.2

The Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments (COG) NCRPortal SharePoint site houses information for numerous committees behind a password gateway known as IAMS. If COG staff has already informed you that it has granted you access to a site, please follow the directions below.

ACCESS

1. Use Internet Explorer (IE) as your browser (other browsers may work fine, especially if just handling PDFs, but IE is necessary for Word and Excel files). To find the IE browser in Windows, go to the Search Bar at lower left and type "IE".
2. Visit the direct URL address of the site you are trying to access OR visit 2-534(e) [redacted]
3. Determine if your organization is affiliated with IAMS by consulting the list below:

Entities that Can User Their Existing Employer-Issued Password to Access IAMS (IAMS—Affililated)

Alexandriava.gov
Any federal government domain (too many to list here, but list is at: https://home.dotgov.gov/data/)
Arlingtonva.us
Charlescountymd.gov
Co.manassas.va.us / manassasva.gov
Co.pg.md.us
Dc.gov
Fairfaxcounty.gov
Fairfaxva.gov (City of Fairfax)
Fallschurchva.gov
Frederickcountymd.gov
Gaithersburgmd.gov
Leesburgva.gov
Loudoun.gov
Maryland.gov (certain agencies like MDOT may not work at this time and must register as external users)
Montgomerycountymd.gov
Mwaa.com
Mwcog.org
Nvers.org
Pwcgov.org
Viennava.gov

a. If you do not specifically see your organization (US Federal Government covers most federal agencies, State of Maryland is only good for @maryland.gov address), then your organization is not IAMS-affiliated. You must first establish a password by enrolling in IAMS before trying to log in. You may have received an initial email from IAMS support. It is not necessary to find that email, just visit 2-534(e) [redacted] and reset/create your password before trying to log in. Then return to Step 1 on this list and select "External Users" from the Authentication

Source dropdown list (see screenshot below). If you see your organization on the dropdown list and it is not in the table shown in these instructions on page 1 (ex. City of Frederick, City of Rockville, WMATA) you may select it, but you will still need to use the new IAMS password your just created.

b. If your organization is on shown in the table on page 1, select it and then select Next.

4. Log in with your email address as your username.
5. Your password is the one you previously set up in step 3a for "External Users", or your existing government password that you use at your workstation for IAMS-affiliated users.

ISSUES WITH VIEWING WORD AND EXCEL FILES

If you experience any problems viewing Word, Excel or other Microsoft software files, please follow the steps below.

1. You must use Internet Explorer as your browser. not (Edge). To find the IE browser in Windows, go to the Search Bar at lower left and type "IE".
2. In Internet Explorer, go to Settings (gear icon at top right) > Internet Options > Security Tab > Trusted Sites Icon > Sites Button > make sure 2-534(e) is on the Websites List, or add it.
3. Close the browser and reopen it. Reboot the machine if necessary.

Those steps solve the problem for most people. If you are still experiencing an issue with a popup box saying the file is corrupt, follow the steps below.

1. Open Excel (also do this for Word if needed).
2. Click on File > Options.
3. Select Trust Center > Trust center settings.
4. Select Protected view.
5. Uncheck all the options under Protected View > OK.
6. Restart Excel/Word and try to open SharePoint files again.

If that does not help, as a work around, you may be able to right click to the left of the line (the check mark) the file is on in SharePoint, select Download, and then save it to your computer.

Kenya Airways Plans More Pay Cuts Due to Pandemic
01/15/2021

Kenya Airways plans further pay cuts for employees of as much as 30% after the airline was hit by the coronavirus pandemic that has caused a slump in air travel, an internal memo showed on Friday. The latest cuts, of 5% to 30% for workers with monthly earnings exceeding 45,000 shillings ($409), take effect this month and will run for six to 12 months, the company's CEO Allan Kilavuka said in an internal memo seen by Reuters. He said in the memo that the company was grappling with debts which are at an unsustainably high level. Although domestic air travel resumed in Kenya in July, followed by international routes a month later, demand has stayed below pre-pandemic levels.

PIA Plane 'Held Back' by Malaysian Authorities Over UK Court Case
01/15/2021

A Pakistan International Airlines plane has been held back by Malaysian authorities over a British court case, the airline said on Friday, adding that it would pursue the matter through diplomatic channels. The Boeing 777 aircraft was seized after a court order, an airline spokesman said, and alternative arrangements were being made for passengers due to fly back to Pakistan. "A PIA aircraft has been held back by a local court in Malaysia taking a one-sided decision pertaining to a legal dispute between PIA and another party pending in a UK court," a PIA spokesman said in a statement.

First Syrian Plane Since 2011 Lands in Beirut
01/15/2021

A Cham Wings plane flying from Aleppo in Syria, landed at one o'clock after midnight at Beirut's Rafik Hariri International Airport following the restoration of air connectivity at Aleppo airport, the National News Agency reported Friday. The round-trip route was resumed after being halted since Syria's conflict began in 2011. Precautionary measures against the coronavirus were in place, with passengers required to show PCR tests taken less than three days before the flight, according to Syria's state news agency SANA. The head of Syrian Air in Lebanon, Rashed Attar, said the flight arrived in Beirut carrying 36 passengers and returned to Aleppo with 44 passengers. Attar said a weekly flight between Aleppo and Beirut will continue.

MARITIME

01/15/2021

Turkish and Greek military delegations are expected to resume technical talks next week at the NATO headquarters, security sources said Friday. The technical talks to discuss maritime disputes between Turkey and Greece were agreed to be held and implemented by the military delegations of the two countries following a meeting held between President Recep Tayyip Erdogan and NATO Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg. Turkey, which has the longest continental coastline in the Eastern Mediterranean, has rejected maritime boundary claims by Greece and the Greek Cypriot administration, stressing that the excessive claims violate the sovereign rights of Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots.

Iran Fires Torpedoes from Homemade Submarine for First Time

The Iranian naval force fired torpedoes from the home-made Fateh(Conqueror)-class submarine, as well as cruise missiles from the seashore and vessels on the second day of a large-scale drill in the country's southern waters. This is the first time Iran's indigenous submarine has fired torpedoes, reports Xinhua news agency. On Thursday, the cruise missiles and the torpedoes hit mock targets successfully during the last stage of the massive military drill in the Sea of Oman. A foreign submarine was detected approaching the area during the exercise and left the area immediately after a warning was issued, the statement added.

US Blacklists Chinese Firms, Executives Over South China Sea

The Trump administration imposed fresh sanctions against Chinese firms and military over its "reckless and belligerent actions" in the South China Sea as well as labeled nine companies including Xiaomi as military controlled and added a government oil company to its Entity List. The Commerce Department said it has added China National Offshore Oil Corporation to its import-export Entity list over its combative actions in the South China Sea. In July, U.S. Secretary of State Mike Pompeo announced the United States rejects most of China's maritime claims to the South China Sea, highlighting the United Nations' 2016 ruling that said the Nine-Dash-Line claim has no grounds.

Guangzhou Development District signed an investment cooperative agreement with South Korean automaker Hyundai to set up Hyundai Motor Company HTWO (Guangzhou) on Friday. According to the agreement, the construction of the company, which is 100 percent owned by Hyundai, will officially begin by the end of February with production scheduled to start in the second half of 2022. PIPELINE / HAZMAT

Germany Approves Resuming Russia Gas Pipeline Work

German authorities gave permission Friday for work to resume on a subsea pipeline bringing natural gas from Russia that's been the target of U.S. sanctions threats. The decision by the Federal Maritime and Hydrographic Agency can be appealed, meaning there could be another halt to the construction on the Nord Stream 2 project, which has drawn major criticism from the United States, some other European countries and environmental groups. German Foreign Minister Heiko Maas added that he did not know whether the companies involved in building the pipeline had plans to immediately resume work following the Maritime and Hydrographic Agency's ruling.

COMMERCIAL USE OF SPACE

01/15/2021

Jeff Bezos' private space tourism company Blue Origin aims to send its first passenger into the edge of space as early as April this year. The company announced the ambitious goal after it completed the fourteenth test flight of its New Shepard rocket and capsule Thursday. The rocket prototype called the NS-14 successfully flew and landed using the company's newly developed booster and upgraded capsule. The test flight is the last remaining step before the company moves forward to launching a manned rocket. Blue Origin's New Shepard spacecraft is designed to carry passengers to the edge of space - or more than 340,000 feet above sea level. Passengers on board will be able to experience several minutes of zero gravity before the vessel returns back to Earth.

TERRORISM / EXTREMISM

46 Civilians Feared Killed in Eastern Congo Attack
01/14/2021

Forty-six civilians are reported to have been killed in an attack by suspected Islamist militants on a village in eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo, a senior provincial official said Thursday. Local security forces have been dispatched to the village in Irumu territory to investigate, Provincial Interior Minister Adjio Gidi said by phone. He said the Allied Democratic Forces (ADF) were behind the raid. The Ugandan armed group is believed to have carried out a string of massacres in eastern Congo, killing more than 1,000 civilians since the start of 2019, according to U.N. figures. Islamic State has claimed responsibility for many suspected ADF attacks in the past, although U.N. experts have not been able to confirm any direct link between the two groups.

US Charges 14 Leaders of MS-13 Gang with Terrorism
01/14/2021

The United States has charged 14 leaders of the international criminal gang MS-13 on terrorism charges, the U.S. Department of Justice said on Thursday, part of an intensified crackdown on the group. The indictment, filed in Central Islip, New York, and unsealed on Thursday, charged the individuals with conspiracies to support terrorists, commit acts of terrorism and finance terrorism, according to the department. “The indictment announced today is the highest-reaching and most sweeping indictment targeting MS-13 and its command and control structure in U.S. history,” acting Attorney General Jeffrey Rosen said in a statement.

CYBER

12,000+ Workers’ Personal Data Leaked by UK Staffing Agency
01/14/2021

A recently discovered unsecured Microsoft Azure Blob contained deeply sensitive documents of more than 12,000 construction workers, including scans of passports, national IDs, birth certificates, and tax returns. The cloud storage also contains self-employment contracts that include personally identifiable information such as full names, addresses, UK national insurance numbers, and signatures. The database appears to belong to Nohow International, a UK-based recruitment and staffing agency that provides blue- and white-collar personnel services to companies across the UK and other countries. Presently, it is unclear if any malicious actors have accessed the unsecured Nohow Azure Blob and downloaded the deeply sensitive documents. The files were stored on a publicly accessible Microsoft Azure server. Accessing and downloading files hosted on public servers requires almost no technical knowledge, which means that there's a good chance that the documents contained in this Blob may have been accessed by cybercriminals for malicious purposes.

ADDITIONAL REPORTING

Russia Follows US to Withdraw from Open Skies Treaty
01/15/2021

Russia said Friday it will withdraw from an international treaty allowing observation flights over military facilities following the U.S. exit from the pact. Russia's Foreign Ministry said in a statement that the U.S. withdrawal from the Open Skies Treaty last year "significantly upended the balance of interests of signatory states," adding that Moscow's proposals to keep the treaty alive after the U.S. exit have been cold-shouldered by Washington's allies. The ministry said that Russia is now launching the relevant procedural moves to withdraw from the pact "due to the lack of progress in removing the obstacles for the treaty's functioning in the new conditions."

Dutch Government Resigns Over Childcare Subsidies Scandal

Prime Minister Mark Rutte announced the resignation of his government on Friday, accepting responsibility for years of mismanagement of childcare subsidies, which wrongfully drove thousands of families to financial ruin. Rutte said he had handed his resignation to King Willem-Alexander. The cabinet would remain in place in a caretaker capacity to manage the coronavirus crisis for now, with an election already due on March 17. The resignation follows a parliamentary inquiry last month that found bureaucrats at the tax service had wrongly accused families of fraud. The inquiry report said around 10,000 families had been forced to repay tens of thousands of euros of subsidies. Many of the families were targeted based on their ethnic origin or dual nationalities, the tax office said last year.

A powerful earthquake killed at least 42 people and injured hundreds on Indonesia's island of Sulawesi on Friday, trapping several under rubble and unleashing dozens of aftershocks as authorities warned of more quakes that could trigger a tsunami. Thousands of frightened residents fled their homes for higher ground when the magnitude 6.2-quake struck 6 km (4 miles) northeast of the town of Majene, at a depth of just 10 km, shortly before 1.30 a.m. The quake and aftershocks damaged more than 300 homes and two hotels, as well as flattening a hospital and the office of a regional governor, where authorities told Reuters several people have been trapped under the rubble. The heightened seismic activity set off three landslides, severed electricity supplies, and damaged bridges linking to regional hubs, such as the city of Makassar. Heavy rain was also worsening conditions for those seeking shelter.

Commercial UAS News

US Patent awarded for broadcast Remote ID (RID)

Ariascend, an Oregon unmanned aircraft systems (UAS) drone research and development company, announced that their CEO, Kenji Sugahara, was recently awarded a patent for broadcast remote identification of drones. The recent FAA announcement of the final rule on Remote Identification of Unmanned Aircraft and the upcoming ASTM standards, cements the patent's applicability and relevance in the industry.

Is this the regulation breakthrough commercial drones need?

- New rules are coming into force this week that will govern how drone operators across EU member states
- More clarity and consistency could pave the way for an acceleration in commercial drone use
- While in Europe, the regulations could serve as a model worldwide in the coming years

One-Handed Controller to Debut at CES 2021

Russian start-up Knuckles-5 has developed a fully one-handed controller for drones and video games that will make its official debut next month at CES 2021. The two traditional joysticks are replaced by two trackballs – one is moved by the index finger, while the other is moved by the thumb. Each trackball controls the drone along two axes of movement. Another two axes are controlled by a thumb-activated mini joystick, while a further two are controlled by an IMU (inertial measurement unit) that detects the direction in which the controller is being tilted. In total the device gives control over eight axes of movement.

FLY-R unveils its new range of UAVs based on the Rhomboidal Wing Configuration

FLY-R SAS unveiled its new corporate image, logo and website. The presentation includes several new FLY-R projects such as the R2-HSTD. The aerodynamics formula of the rhomboidal wing is a technology breakthrough and was largely proven by FLY-R on its R2-150 and R2-240 UAVs. It has now been extended to new models of UAVs up to 6m wingspan.

Sony's Airpeak drone unveiled to the public

Sony launched the Airpeak brand with the goal to further develop today's drone technology while achieving the utmost in value creation. As the first phase of this project, Sony will launch a new business targeted for professional photography and video production in the spring of 2021. In order to fully support the creativity of video creators, the payload of the drone can be equipped with an Alpha™ mirrorless camera to capture high quality, full frame aerial photography and video. Airpeak, the industry's smallest class of drone that can be equipped with the Alpha system, is capable of dynamic filming and precise, stable flight, and aims to contribute to the world of entertainment while also pursuing new possibilities for creative expression.

DRONELIFE is honored to publish this joint op-ed from two of the industry's leading voices: AUVSI President and CEO Brian Wynne, and Kevin Burke, President and CEO of Airports Council International, North America (ACI-NA.)

New Members Appointed to the Drone Advisory Committee

U.S. Department of Transportation Secretary Elaine L. Chao announced new appointments to the Federal Aviation Administration's (FAA) Drone Advisory Committee or DAC. "The Drone Advisory Committee is key to helping the FAA keep pace with innovation while protecting safety," said U.S. Transportation Secretary Elaine L. Chao. Members are executives who represent a variety of unmanned aircraft systems (UAS) interests, including industry, research, academia, retail, technology, and state and local government.

UAS Emerging Capabilities

Drones That Can Detect Infected Citrus Trees Create New Opportunities in Precision Agriculture

As one of the winners at the most recent press showcases held during the Commercial UAV Expo, Agrowing Ltd., has an established track record when it comes to enabling powerful tools for farmers and growers. The provider of AI-enabling multispectral sensors consistently creates products that set it apart from the competition to enable real opportunities for users. The inherent power and utility of their products was readily apparent in their recent announcement about a significant breakthrough in leaf-level and aerial HLB detection in Citrus.

Drone Technology Extends Reach of Mobile IoT

Drones can be used for a variety of endeavors, from the solemn task of remote warfare to the antics of amateur aviators. But there's a lot more drone activity filling the gap between military tool and hobbyist toys as enterprises have begun to appreciate the operational and economic benefits of drone-enabled functions.

Variously referred to as unmanned aerial vehicles (UAV) or unmanned aircraft systems (UAS), drones are uniquely able to explore and report on locations that may be inaccessible via other means. In an IoT setting, a drone could act as a mobile sensor to gather data and relay it back to a cloud app or some other analytics service.

Pineapple waste used to build disposable drones

Researchers in Malaysia have developed a method to transform the fibre found in normally discarded pineapple leaves to make a strong material that can be used to build the frames for unmanned aircraft, e.g. drones.

Draganfly Patents Variable Center of Gravity for VTOL Delivery Drones

Draganfly Inc. has announced the awarding of a new patent for a vertical take-off and landing (VTOL) cargo delivery drone with variable center of gravity. The design is ideal for Beyond Visual Line of Sight (BVLOS) and for transporting goods in hard to reach areas or flight over people at night.

Dubai Tech Company Develops Magnetic Shield C-UAS System

Cusp Technologies, a Dubai-based tech solutions company, has developed a new system for using magnetic beams in many applications specially in defense and space. One of its main applications is to repel hostile drone attacks.

French Drone Maker Unleashes Autonomous Swarm Concept at CES 2021

During CES 2021, French drone manufacturer Icarus Swarms announced a new UAS product line targeting security and emergency first-response industries. A company spokesperson says the new line is “based on a pioneering technology using intelligent pathfinding algorithms and microdrones coordinated in a swarm.”

How AI and connectivity could unlock a new drone age for the industry

The ability to fly connected drones “beyond visual line of sight” on automated missions could transform many business operations, experts believe. Today, if you want to inspect a building site or other installation with a drone you need a pilot standing nearby to keep an eye on the craft at all times and control it over a radio connection.

But, according to John McKenna, chief executive of sees.ai, a tech company working on how drones can be operated remotely using artificial intelligence, this means that a pilot “has to drive to the site, go through a health and safety induction before flying, and then after flying, pack up and drive back to the office.” This “wastes a lot of time”, he says, and is preventing drones from fulfilling their potential as useful monitors inspecting places that are difficult or dangerous for humans to reach. So his company is working on a project with Tokyo-based TerraDrone, and with Vodafone as technical partner, to see how drones could be operated remotely “beyond visual line of sight” (BVLOS) without compromising safety.

Red Cat partners with Skypersonic Completes Long Distance Drone Flight Remotely

Red Cat Holdings, Inc. (OTCQB: RCAT) (“Red Cat” or the “Company”), a leading brand in the drone industry, announced that Fat Shark, a wholly-owned subsidiary, had partnered with Skypersonic, the manufacturer of the Skycopter UAV, to complete a long-distance drone flight remotely. The flight consisted of a pilot, located in Orlando, Florida, controlling a drone flying in Detroit, Michigan. The flight integrated Fat Shark’s new digital technology, “Shark Byte” with Skypersonic’s Skycopter and remote pilot software system. The pilot's flight instructions to the drone were transmitted through Skypersonic's servers located in Italy. The companies believe this represents the first commercial completion of a remote flight similar to how drones are used by military forces.

Drones could become the future of quantum internet

Researchers have managed to use drones to transmit light particles across large distances to transmit information. A team from the Nanjing University in China has transmitted data using drones over a one-kilometer (0.62 miles) distance. The paper released onto APS.org states that entanglement distribution has been achieved by flying a drone with a transmitter to send out entangled photons.

When a proton is entangled, no matter the distance between them, the other will perform a predicted behavior if something happens to one. Once this drone is up, another drone takes to the sky, equipped with an optical relay in it at about 0.62 miles away. This relay also reshapes the wavefront of photons, which is best explained when a rock is dropped into the water and it creates waves that spread out along the surface of the water in all directions with the same velocity.

The end goal for the researchers and scientists involved in the project is to have a mesh network of these drones in the air transmitting, receiving, and relaying data to create a network that could spread over the whole world, without the need for a large amount of ground infrastructure.

Researchers can now keep drones flying when a motor fails

Researchers at the University of Zurich and the Delft University of Technology have been able to keep a drone flying after a motor fails. The researchers have managed to use onboard cameras to keep the test drones in the air and flying safely.

This Lynchpin Contest drone has astonishing flight abilities

We always enjoy coming across a drone that has new capabilities. And we've never seen a drone like this one. A friend sent a text. Check out this video, it said. There was a YouTube link. I clicked. A weird-looking drone popped into view. But then that drone began doing things that appeared nearly impossible. It was rolling while maintaining position. It was flying in ways I'd never before seen – so it clearly had my attention. In a moment, I think it will have yours.

Tinamu Labs Showcases the Potential of Automated Indoor Drone Applications at CES 2021

Tinamu replaces large static sensor networks that consist of numerous fixed cameras with one flying sensor. Their drone-based inspection automation solution consists of a dashboard that visualizes relevant information, analytics software running on a secured cloud, and the drone system connected to a communication network. Their commercial drone use cases detail how the technology is being used for conveyor belt inspections, in warehouses and for infrastructure inspections.

UAS Policy

Tighter weapon controls to cover armed drones, 3D-printed guns

A proposed law on guns, explosives and weapons discussed in Parliament yesterday aims to further tighten controls and strengthen penalties for high-risk items such as automatic weapons. The changes also aim to address new threats posed by technology shifts, such as 3D-printed guns and drones mounted with weapons.

Florida Senate bill seeks expanded use of drones

A bill filed Monday in the Florida Senate would allow law enforcement to use drones to monitor large crowds, assist with traffic control and collect crime-scene evidence.

Sen. Tom Wright, a New Smyrna Beach Republican who chairs the Senate Military and Veterans Affairs, Space and Domestic Security Committee, is sponsoring the bill (SB 44), which would expand the allowed uses of unmanned aircraft so law enforcement would be able to get aerial perspectives of crowds topping 50 people.

Army announces release of DoD Counter-Small UAS Strategy

Department of Defense leadership recently approved a new strategy to lead and direct Counter-Small Unmanned Aircraft Systems (C-sUAS) activities across the Department. This strategy will provide the framework for addressing sUAS hazards and threats in a variety of operating environments, including the U.S. homeland, host nations, and contingency locations.

More Shots Fired in U.S. – China Tech War, Implications for Commercial Drone Industry

On January 5, 2021, the President signed Executive Order (EO) 13971, Addressing the Threat Posed by Applications and Other Software Developed or Controlled by Chinese Companies, which prohibits persons subject to the jurisdiction of the United States (U.S. citizens/residents and corporations) from transacting with persons that develop or control Chinese connected software applications or their subsidiaries. These prohibitions kick in 45 days from publication.

UAS Incidents and Events

Smaller, cheaper drones have outsized impact on the future of war

Azerbaijan's successful use of drones during its recent war with Armenia, specialists say, has captured the attention of military leaders around the world and accelerated a move toward a generation of unmanned aerial vehicles that are smaller, cheaper and easier to operate.

Even the leaders of major Western military powers such as Britain have signaled a coming shift in their drone strategies after watching Azerbaijani aircraft rain destruction on Armenian troops and traditional ground combat vehicles during the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict this fall.

NYPD, US Army, carried out drone detection trials in NYC

The ability to detect drones is important. And, over the course of two nights last fall, a division of the NYPD carried out an ambitious exercise designed to test multiple drone detection technologies. We like to think all drone operators are responsible, but we know that's not the case. We've all seen stories about drones delivering contraband to prisons, flying where they shouldn't, and even disrupting major sporting events. So there are plenty of good (and bad) reasons why police in a major city might want to ensure they have the ability to quicky and accurately detect drones. That's precisely what this exercise was about.

Drone pilot pleads guilty to chopper collision; could face one year in prison

In what appears to be a first, a drone pilot has pleaded guilty to colliding his drone into a Los Angeles Police Department helicopter. It's believed to be the first criminal conviction in the United States for unsafe operation of an unmanned aircraft.

Subject: [EXTERNAL EMAIL] - RE: <External>RE: [Non-DoD Source] Intelligence Subcommittee Meeting

Thank you sir. We'll brief out as well. Please see below:

Metro will alter both bus and rail service schedules beginning Friday, January 15th through Thursday, January 21st.

Beginning with the start of rail service on Friday, January 15th through close of service on Thursday, January 21st, all trains will bypass 11 stations that are closed inside the perimeter. Two more stations – Metro Center and Gallery Place – will close Saturday, January 16th through Thursday, January 21st. Beginning on Saturday, January 16th through Thursday, January 21st, trains will operate on a Saturday schedule (every 15 mins. on all lines/every 12 mins. on Red) every day, bypassing all closed stations since residents are urged by local officials to stay out of the downtown core.

Rail station closures by line include:

Red	Yellow/Green	Blue	Blue/Orange/Silver
Farragut North	Archives-Navy Memorial	Arlington Cemetery	Farragut West
Judiciary Square			McPherson Square
Union Station			Federal Center SW
Metro Center*			Capitol South
Gallery Place*			Smithsonian
			Federal Triangle

*(Closing Saturday)

During this time, 26 bus routes will be detoured around the expanded security perimeter. Outside the perimeter, the level of bus service will remain normal on weekdays and weekends. However, on Wednesday, January 20th, all buses will operate on a Saturday schedule. Additional station closures and bus detours may be necessary on a temporary basis during this period for security reasons.

Subject: [EXTERNAL EMAIL] - RE: <External>RE: [Non-DoD Source] Intelligence Subcommittee Meeting

Thank you sir. We'll brief out as well. Please see below:

Metro will alter both bus and rail service schedules beginning Friday, January 15th through Thursday, January 21st.

Beginning with the start of rail service on Friday, January 15th through close of service on Thursday, January 21st, all trains will bypass 11 stations that are closed inside the perimeter. Two more stations – Metro Center and Gallery Place – will close Saturday, January 16th through Thursday, January 21st. Beginning on Saturday, January 16th through Thursday, January 21st, trains will operate on a Saturday schedule (every 15 mins. on all lines/every 12 mins. on Red) every day, bypassing all closed stations since residents are urged by local officials to stay out of the downtown core.

Rail station closures by line include:

Red	Yellow/Green	Blue	Blue/Orange/Silver
Farragut North	Archives-Navy Memorial	Arlington Cemetery	Farragut West
Judiciary Square			McPherson Square
Union Station			Federal Center SW
Metro Center*			Capitol South

*(Closing Saturday)

During this time, 26 bus routes will be detoured around the expanded security perimeter. Outside the perimeter, the level of bus service will remain normal on weekdays and weekends. However, on Wednesday, January 20th, all buses will operate on a Saturday schedule. Additional station closures and bus detours may be necessary on a temporary basis during this period for security reasons.

(U) United States: 'We're all on high alert': Delta to Ban Checked Firearms, Increase Security On Flights to DC

(U) Starting this weekend, Delta Air Lines CEO Ed Bastian said the airline will ban passengers traveling to Washington, D.C., from checking firearms as part of increased security measures ahead of the inauguration. "We're all on high alert based on the events over the last couple of weeks up in Washington," Bastian said in an interview on CNBC early Thursday. Only law enforcement officials will be exempt from the ban. Bastian said the airline will also add other security measures at the airports and on planes — seen and unseen — in the coming days "as we look to the week ahead."

(U) United States: FAA Toughens Unruly Passenger Policy After Flight Disruptions in Wake of Capitol Riot

(U) The Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) will begin handing down stricter punishments to unruly airline passengers without a warning, including "fines of up to $35,000 and imprisonment." FAA Administrator Steve Dickson signed the order Wednesday directing the agency to take a "zero tolerance policy" in unruly passenger cases after the agency saw a "disturbing increase in incidents" of passengers disrupting flights with "threatening or violent behavior." "Historically, the agency has addressed unruly passenger incidents using a variety of methods ranging from warnings and counseling to civil penalties," the FAA said in a news release. "Effective immediately, however, the FAA will not address these cases with warnings or counseling. The agency will pursue legal enforcement action against any passenger who assaults, threatens, intimidates or interferes with airline crew members." The FAA's new policy will remain in effect through March 30.

(U) United States: DC Metro to Close 13 Stations for A Week Amid Threats of Inauguration Violence

(U) Metro will shut down more than a dozen stations near the U.S. Capitol and Mall for days around the presidential inauguration because of the possibility of violent protests. Starting Friday, the transit agency will begin closing 13 stations through the following Thursday, the day after President-elect Joe Biden is inaugurated on the steps of the Capitol. Metrobus service and routes also will be adjusted around a security perimeter guarded by fences and an expected 20,000 members of the National Guard. The transit precautions were made through coordination with the Secret Service, which is directing safety of the event after last week's attempted insurrection and riot at the U.S. Capitol that left five dead and wounded several others.

(U) United States: Capitol Investigators Try to Sort Real Tips from Noise

(U) Potential threats and leads are pouring in to law enforcement agencies nationwide after the insurrection at the U.S. Capitol. The challenge is now figuring out what's real and what's just noise. Investigators are combing through a mountain of online posts, street surveillance and other intelligence, including information that suggests mobs could try to storm the Capitol again and threats to kill some members of Congress. Security is being tightened from coast to coast. Thousands of National Guard troops are guarding the Capitol ahead of President-elect Joe Biden's inauguration. Governors and lawmakers are stepping up protections at statehouses after an FBI bulletin this week warned of threats to legislative sessions and other inaugural ceremonies. A primary concern is the safety of members of Congress, particularly when they are traveling through airports, according to two U.S. officials briefed on the matter. Since last week, the FBI has opened 170 case files and received more than 100,000 pieces of digital media. The threats have ranged in specificity and complexity, according to officials briefed on them, making it difficult for authorities to determine which could be credible.

(U) United States, NY: Proud Boys Fan Stockpiled Ammo, Knives in NY Home: FBI

(U) A Proud Boys supporter who threatened to deploy "three cars full of armed patriots" to Washington last week was charged Wednesday with stockpiling military-style combat knives and more than 1,000 rifle rounds in his New York home, federal authorities said. Eduard Florea,

40, was charged with possessing ammunition as a convicted felon and denied bail after the FBI searched his Queens home and interviewed him about a series of threats about the deadly siege on the U.S. Capitol they said he made on the social network Parler. Prosecutors said the software engineer vowed to travel to the nation's capital and slice "a throat" at the Jan. 6 riot by supporters of President Donald Trump. Another post attributed to Florea threatened the life of U.S. Sen.-elect Raphael Warnock of Georgia, authorities said. "The time for peace and civility is over," Florea wrote, according to a criminal complaint. "I will be reaching out to patriots in my area so we can come up with a game plan." Assistant U.S. Attorney Francisco J. Navarro said Florea posed a flight risk and is "particularly dangerous in the current political environment." He said Florea applied to join the Proud Boys, a far-right group, but was not yet a member because he had not attended the requisite number of meetings. He said Florea traveled to Washington in December and was with the group when it vandalized a church. U.S. Magistrate Judge Sanket Bulsara ordered Florea held without bail, saying the evidence suggested "a premediated plan to exact violence against people in New York and people in Washington."

(U) United States: Coast Guard to Establish, Enforce Multiple Security Zones for the 59th Presidential Inauguration

(U) The Coast Guard will enforce three temporary security zones in the National Capital Region for the 59th Presidential Inauguration, beginning at 8 a.m., on January 13 and ending 8 a.m., January 25, 2021. During the enforcement period, entry into or remaining in the zones is prohibited by law, unless authorized by the Coast Guard Captain of the Port of Maryland-National Capital Region. Persons or vessel violating this section may be subject to civil or criminal penalties pursuant to 46 U.S.C. 70036. The Coast Guard is establishing the security zones as described in Title 33 Code of Federal Regulations (CFR) §165.508. The Coast Guard will establish a security zone encompassing certain waters of the Potomac River and Anacostia River, and adjacent waters in Washington D.C. The Coast Guard may be assisted by other federal, state or local law enforcement agencies in enforcing this regulation. The U.S. Secret Service is the lead federal agency for this National Special Security Event.

(U) United States: Passengers Banned from U.S. Airlines Top 2,700, With Dozens Added in Wake of Capitol Riot

(U) During an Alaska Airlines flight from Washington, D.C. to Seattle last week, a number of passengers refused to wear masks and harassed crew members, the airline said. In response, Alaska banned 14 of the passengers on that Thursday flight — just some of a growing number of disruptive passengers' airlines are putting on their own no-fly lists. And now the Federal Aviation Administration has announced it will start taking legal action over such behavior going forward. Calling those passengers "rowdy" and "argumentative," Alaska Airlines said in a statement it has banned more than 300 passengers since August for violating its mask policy.

(U) United States: U.S. Border Closure Extended to Feb. 21

(U) The land borders between the United States, Canada and Mexico will remain closed to nonessential travel until at least Feb. 21. U.S. Homeland Security announced the U.S.-Mexico-border closure extension on Tuesday. Commercial trucks will continue to move freely across the borders, as the movement of essential goods remains exempt from the restrictions. "We are working closely with Mexico & Canada to keep essential trade & travel open while also protecting our citizens from the virus," DHS said in a tweet. "DHS is working closely with our counterparts in Mexico and Canada to identify appropriate public health conditions to safely ease restrictions in the future and support U.S. border communities." Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau also announced Tuesday another 30-day extension of the closure of Canada's border with the U.S. until Feb. 21. The borders have been closed for nonessential travel since March to slow the spread of COVID-19.

(U) Uganda: Uganda Orders Internet Blackout Until Further Notice

(U) Uganda's communications regulator ordered telecoms operators in the country to suspend all internet gateways from Wednesday evening until further notice, South African telecoms company MTN Group said. The blackout came on the eve of a presidential election in which long-time leader Yoweri Museveni is facing an opposition galvanized by popular singer Bobi Wine, despite a campaign marked by brutal crackdowns. Ugandans reported difficulties accessing the internet via mobile devices and wireless connections on Wednesday evening and internet monitor NetBlocks said on Twitter that the country was experiencing a nationwide blackout from 7 p.m. (1600 GMT). "I can confirm that MTN Uganda and all Licensed Telecommunication Operators in the country have received a directive from Uganda Communications Commission (UCC) to implement a suspension of the operation of all internet Gateways and associated access points," Nompilo Morafo, MTN's group executive for corporate affairs told Reuters. The internet ban came day after Uganda banned all social media and messaging apps ahead of the vote, which the president said was in retaliation for Facebook taking down some pro-government accounts.

(U) Worldwide: Ship Insurers Primed to Raise Rates After Red Sea Attacks

(U) Insurers are set to raise the cost of providing cover for merchant ships through the Red Sea after a series of incidents that have hit vessels around Saudi Arabian waters, industry sources said. The possibility of more attacks on commercial shipping carrying oil and commodities through these waterways is growing after the outgoing U.S. administration's move to designate Yemen's Iran-aligned Houthi movement as a foreign terrorist organization. "We are seeing increased rates for vessels making port calls in the Red Sea due to concerns over risk of attack by militia groups, whereas previously this was of an issue of more concern in the Arabian Gulf," said Mike Ingham with insurance broker Gallagher. "This will be impacting vessels travelling to Red Sea ports such as Jeddah." Every ship needs various forms of insurance, including annual war-risk cover as well as an additional "breach" premium when entering high-risk areas. These separate premiums are calculated according to the value of the ship, or hull, for a seven-day period. "The real debate is on the Red Sea side after the incidents involving explosive devices. Everyone is watching what happens next," one war underwriter said. The Red Sea is one of the world's busiest shipping lanes leading up to the Suez Canal, with thousands of transits made annually through the Bab al-Mandab waterway at its southern tip.

(U) New Zealand: New Zealand to Review Parliament Security After Door Attack

(U) Officials plan to review security at New Zealand's Parliament after a man armed with an axe smashed the main glass entrance doors early Wednesday. Police said they were called to the Parliament complex in Wellington just before 5:30 a.m. after getting reports that a man with an axe was on the grounds. Police said that after smashing the doors, the 31-year-old man didn't try to enter the building and was arrested within minutes without further incident. New Zealand's 120 lawmakers are currently on a summer break, and there were few people in the building at the time of the attack. The man has been charged with intentional damage and possession of an offensive weapon. If found guilty, he could face up to seven years in prison. A judge temporarily suppressed the man's name, a common practice in New Zealand's justice system. It was not immediately clear whether the recent attacks at the U.S. Capitol in Washington played any role in inspiring the New Zealand attack.

NOAA WEATHER OUTLOOK

Today: Friday, January 15, 2021

Heavy Snow (Northwest, Upper Midwest, Northeast); Blizzard Conditions (Central Plains, Upper Midwest); Freezing Rain (Northwest, Northeast, Central Appalachians); Critical Fire Weather (Southern California, Southern Plains); High Winds (Plains)

- As an area pf high pressure moves eastward into New Brunswick Canada, low pressure will progress into southern Wisconsin. A cold front will extend from the low thru the Ohio River Valley and into the Gulf of Mexico after passing thru western portion of Florida peninsula. A warm front will mark the leading edge of warm, moist air that will override a stubborn cold air mass over the Northeast.
    - Rain showers will occur from Florida to the New England maritime.
    - Mixed rain and snow will fall across much of the Tennessee River Valley, and thru the Great Lakes and into southern Ontario and northern New England. Snow is possible for some areas near the Canadian border, especially for northern Maine.
    - In colder air to the west, areas from North Dakota to the middle Mississippi River Valley will see snow, with some of it being heavy, especially across southern Minnesota and northern Iowa.
    - Freezing rain is possible for portions of the central Appalachians and upstate New York.
    - Winds behind the cold front will be gusty leading to elevated fire weather conditions across much of the Southern Plains. Winds will also be strong across much of the Central Plains, especially in the Missouri River Valley, leading to blizzard conditions.
- Meanwhile, in the Far West, high pressure will build across the northern Great Basin as a frontal system edges its way onshore in the Northwest.
    - Snow is possible across the Tetons and higher terrain of Wyoming and I-80 corridor from northern Utah into Cheyenne Ridge.
    - Rain showers will be prevalent from Vancouver to northern California.
    - Mixed rain and snow will fall across much of Washington, Oregon, Idaho and western Montana. Some of the higher valleys of Washington could see freezing rain.
    - As winds increase and relative humidity levels decrease across southern California, one can expect elevated to critical fire weather conditions for southern California. This will continue into Sunday at least.

Tomorrow: Saturday, January 16, 2021

Low pressure will move from southern Wisconsin to Lower Michigan. The occluded front will extend from it to northern New Jersey. A cold front will drop south across the open waters of the west Atlantic, slicing across the Bahamas and Cuba.

- Mixed wintry precipitation will be found across the eastern Great Lakes, Northeast, New England, Ohio River Valley and much of the central and northern Appalachians.
- Some areas of upstate New York, especially near Lake Champlain, as well as the Green and White Mountains of New Hampshire and Maine, will see some heavy snow with accumulations over 6 inches.
- A few rain showers are likely for parts of the central Northeast coastal region.

Fair and dry weather on tap for the Great Plains, Mississippi River Valley and the South.

A combo of weather systems will slide across the western Central Plains, one in the Black Hills region of South Dakota and the other over southeast Colorado.

- Snow will develop across the central Rockies and adjacent High Plains.

Elsewhere, weak low pressure will move into the Northwest as high pressure remains across the Great Basin.

- Additionally, rain and higher elevation snow expected for the Cascades and Olympic ranges.
- Offshore flow will lead to continued critical fire weather conditions across southern California.

Day 3: Sunday, January 17, 2021

Low pressure will reside over southern Quebec with a cold front extending from it across the Northeast and Great Lakes.

- Mixed wintry precipitation will fall across the Ohio River Valley.
- Light snow showers will be widespread from Upper Midwest to southern Great Lakes and Northeast.
- It will be quite windy in the Appalachians as troughs pass through the area.

Weak storm systems will bring some snow across the northern Rockies and Northern Plains, as well as some mixed rain and snow from eastern Washington to eastern Montana.

Frontal system will move into Northwest US with rain showers from Vancouver to southwest Oregon as the result. Elevated to critical fire weather conditions will likely continue into late Sunday for southern California.

CISA launches new effort to develop actionable metrics to quantify cyber risk < Caution-https://www.securitymagazine.com/articles/94353-cisa-launches-new-effort-to-develop-actionable-metrics-to-quantify-cyber-risk > (01/15) Security Magazine
The Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA) has launched a new cybersecurity effort: The Systemic Cyber Risk Reduction Venture on developing actionable metrics to quantify cyber risk. This information will be used to reduce shared risk to the nation's security. The effort, in partnership with the National Risk Management Center (NRMC), CISA will be focusing on using enterprise risk management best practices in 2021. According to Bob Kolasky, CISA Assistant Director for the National Risk Management Center, CISA is anticipating three overarching lines of effort.

CISA Warns of Cloud Attacks Exploiting Poor Cyber-Hygiene < Caution-https://www.infosecurity-magazine.com/news/cisa-warns-of-cloud-attacks-poor/ > (01/14) Info-Security Magazine
A US cybersecurity agency is urging organizations to improve their cyber-hygiene after warning of multiple successful attacks targeting cloud services used by remote workers. The Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA) revealed in a report yesterday that attackers are increasingly targeting corporate and personal laptops with phishing, brute force login attempts and possibly a “pass-the-cookie” attack to access cloud accounts. Although these attacks were not tied back to a single threat actor, they shared many of the same tactics.

CISA: Hackers bypassed MFA to access cloud service accounts < Caution-https://www.securitymagazine.com/articles/94346-cisa-hackers-bypassed-mfa-to-access-cloud-service-accounts > (01/14) Security Magazine
In a new alert, the Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA) announced that it is aware of several recent successful cyberattacks against various organizations’ cloud services. Threat actors are using phishing and other vectors to exploit poor cyber hygiene practices within a victims’ cloud services configuration. These types of attacks frequently occurred when victim organizations’ employees worked remotely and used a mixture of corporate laptops and personal devices to access their respective cloud services.

Can agencies comply with CISA's demands? < Caution-https://federalnewsnetwork.com/cybersecurity/2021/01/can-agencies-comply-with-cisas-demands/ > (01/14) Federal News Network

Federal agencies – and there are several of them at least – affected by the SolarWinds cybersecurity fiasco are under a new deadline. Days ago policy from the Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency gives them to the end of the month to complete forensic analysis and to harden their systems. Michael Hamilton questions whether this will be even possible, as he told Federal Drive with Tom Temin. He's the former vice chairman of the DHS Coordinating Council, now the chief information security officer at CI security.

CISA: Poor Cyber Hygiene Exploited to Compromise Cloud Security Services < Caution-https://healthitsecurity.com/news/cisa-poor-cyber-hygiene-exploited-to-compromise-cloud-security-services > (01/14) HealthITSecurity

Threat actors are successfully exploiting organizations with poor cyber hygiene to compromise cloud security services, according to a new Department of Homeland Security Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency alert. CISA is aware of multiple, recent cyberattacks against a range of enterprise cloud services. Hackers are leveraging various tactics and techniques, such as phishing attacks and brute force login attempts, in an effort to exploit weaknesses in cloud security practices.

Cloud Attacks Are Bypassing MFA, Feds Warn < Caution-https://threatpost.com/cloud-attacks-bypass-mfa-feds/163056/ > (01/14) Threatpost

CISA has issued an alert warning that cloud services at U.S. organizations are being actively and successfully targeted. The Feds are warning that cybercriminals are bypassing multi-factor authentication (MFA) and successfully attacking cloud services at various U.S. organizations. According to an alert issued Wednesday by the Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA), there have been "several recent successful cyberattacks" focused on compromising the cloud. Most of the attacks are opportunistic, taking advantage of poor cloud cyber-hygiene and misconfigurations, according to the agency.

US government warns of cyberattacks targeting cloud services < Caution-https://www.techrepublic.com/article/us-government-warns-of-cyberattacks-targeting-cloud-services/ > (01/14) Tech Republic

Organizations with remote workers who use cloud-based services are being warned of several recent successful cyberattacks against those services. In an advisory issued on Wednesday, CISA (Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency) revealed that hackers have been employing successful phishing campaigns, brute force login attempts, and potentially pass-the-cookie attacks to exploit weaknesses in cloud security practices. In a pass-the-cookie attack, hackers steal cookies from a user's browsing session so they can then access a certain site as the victim.

The US Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA) has warned organizations that hackers are bypassing multi-factor authentication (MFA) protocols to breach cloud service accounts. In a report, the CISA said it was aware of several recent successful cyber attacks against various organizations' cloud services. Hackers used "phishing and other vectors to exploit poor cyber hygiene practices within a victims' cloud services configuration."

The Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA) on Wednesday said it discovered several recent successful cyberattacks against the cloud services of multiple organizations, offering guidance on how security teams can bolster associated security. CISA said in its report that threat actors have used a variety of tactics and techniques—including phishing, brute force login attempts, and possibly a so-called "pass-the-cookie" attack that bypassed multifactor authentication to exploit cloud security weaknesses.

CISA tells agencies to consider and blockers to fend off 'malvertising' < Caution-https://www.cyberscoop.com/ad-blockers-security-nsa-dhs-wyden/?category_news=government > (01/14) Cyberscoop

The U.S. Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency urged federal agencies on Thursday to deploy ad-blocking software and standardize web browser usage across their workforces in order to fend off advertisements implanted with malware. "With many agencies greatly expanding telework options, agencies should increase attention on securing federal endpoints, including associated web browsing capabilities," the Department of Homeland Security's cyber arm said in a guide for agencies.

The Covid-19 Death Toll Is Even Worse Than It Looks < Caution-https://www.wsj.com/articles/the-covid-19-death-toll-is-even-worse-than-it-looks-11610636840 > (01/14) The Wall Street Journal

The recorded death count from the Covid-19 pandemic as of Thursday is nearing 2 million. The true extent is far worse. More than 2.8 million people have lost their lives due to the pandemic, according to a Wall Street Journal analysis of data from 59 countries and jurisdictions. This tally offers the most comprehensive view yet of the pandemic's global impact. Deaths in these places last year surged more than 12% above average levels. Less than two-thirds of that surge has been attributed directly to Covid-19. Public-health experts believe that many, if not most, of the additional deaths were directly linked to the disease, particularly early in the pandemic when testing was sparse.

President-elect Joe Biden outlined his plans for economic relief from the coronavirus crisis on Thursday, citing the need for a more robust vaccination plan as well as for additional direct payments to American families to help recover the U.S. economy. His plan, called the American Rescue Plan, is expected to cost $1.9 trillion. The package includes $1,400 direct stimulus checks, which would supplement the $600 checks Congress passed late last year. Biden also proposes an additional $160 billion for a national vaccine program, including $20 billion for distribution, and an additional $50 billion for expanded testing.

The national cyberattack that targeted the SolarWinds computer network monitoring software could have impacted some University of Wisconsin System campuses that use it. In mid-December, news broke that a massive computer breach gave hackers months to sift through United States government computer networks. It's been reported that cybersecurity experts believe the hack was carried out by Russia's foreign intelligence service known as the SVR.

Cybersecurity firm identifies third SolarWinds hack malware strain < Caution-https://www.foxbusiness.com/technology/cybersecurity-firm-third-malware-strain-solarwinds-hack > (01/14) Fox Business

One of the cybersecurity firms investigating the SolarWinds attack said it has identified a third malware strain involved in the hack. Security firm CrowdStrike identified and named the strain Sunspot, adding that the strain was also the first one used of the three -- the other two are called Sunburst and Teardrop. Sunspot was planted on the SolarWinds build server, creating the opening for Sunburst to first enter the system, according to Crowdstrike's report.

SolarWinds Cyber-Attack Has Significant Implications for Developers and Contractors < Caution-https://www.natlawreview.com/article/solarwinds-cyber-attack-has-significant-implications-developers-and-contractors > (01/14) National Law Review

ICYMI, on Wednesday, January 6, 2021, the United States Department of Justice (DOJ) issued an update about what it termed "a major incident under the Federal Information Security Modernization Act": the global SolarWinds cyberattack that had compromised its email system. (SolarWinds is a software provider. In December, 2020, SolarWinds revealed that cybercriminals had injected malware into its Orion® Platform software, a platform used for centralized IT monitoring and management.

Cyber insurance vendors are expected to spend $90 million on incident response and forensic services for clients who were compromised by the SolarWinds hackers. "Although the SolarWinds attack is a cyber catastrophe from a national security perspective, insurers may have narrowly avoided a catastrophic financial incident to their businesses," said Samit Shah, director of insurance programs and partnerships for Boston-based cyber risk vendor BitSight.

Capitol Hill riot crackdown leaves extremists searching for more secure messaging platforms, US intel memo says < Caution-https://www.cyberscoop.com/capitol-hill-riot-extremists-intelligence-bulletin-encryption/ > (01/14) CyberScoop

A law enforcement crackdown on domestic terrorists following the Capitol Hill riot will likely lead some violent extremists to turn to communications platforms they perceive to be more secure to discuss their activities, according to a U.S. intelligence bulletin obtained by CyberScoop. The arrests of Jan. 6 rioters could deter some domestic violent extremists (DVEs), but "lead others to adjust their tactics and to lessen law enforcement scrutiny," says the Jan. 13 memo from the Department of Homeland Security, FBI and the National Counterterrorism Center.

NSA advises companies to avoid third party DNS resolvers < Caution-https://www.bleepingcomputer.com/news/security/nsa-advises-companies-to-avoid-third-party-dns-resolvers/ > (01/14) Bleeping Computer

The US National Security Agency (NSA) says that companies should avoid using third party DNS resolvers to block threat actors' DNS traffic eavesdropping and manipulation attempts and to block access to internal network information. NSA's recommendation was made in a new advisory on the benefits (and risks) of using DNS over HTTPS (DoH) in enterprise environments, an encrypted domain name system (DNS) protocol that blocks unauthorized access to the DNS traffic between clients and DNS resolvers.

Telegram Bots at Heart of Classiscam Scam-as-a-Service < Caution-https://threatpost.com/telegram-bots-classiscam-scam/163061/ > (01/14) Threatpost

The cybercriminal service has scammed victims out of $6.5 million and continues to spread on Telegram. A new automated scam-as-a-service has been unearthed, which leverages Telegram bots in order to steal money and payment data from European victims. The scam, which researchers call Classiscam, is being sold as a service by Russian-speaking cybercriminals, and has been used by at least 40 separate cybergangs – which altogether made at least $6.5 million using the service in 2020.

NASCIO pushes feds for more cybersecurity help < Caution-https://gcn.com/articles/2021/01/14/nascio-advocacy-cyber.aspx > (01/14) GCN

For 2021, the National Association of State Chief Information Officers wants the federal government to address its long-standing cybersecurity concerns. Among its advocacy priorities, NASCIO is pushing for harmonized federal cybersecurity regulations, a dedicated cybersecurity grant program for state and local governments and widespread adoption of the .gov domain. For many years, states have complained that federal agencies' various security requirements for exchanging sensitive data places an undue burden on state governments as they struggle to comply with each agency's standards. In May 2020, the Government Accountability Office found that between 49% and 79% of federal agency cybersecurity requirements had conflicting parameters. NASCIO is urging Congress and agencies to streamline and coordinate their cybersecurity regulations to address duplicate regulations and inconsistent audit practices.

NSA warns against using DoH inside enterprise networks < Caution-https://www.zdnet.com/article/nsa-warns-against-using-doh-inside-enterprise-networks/ > (01/14) ZD Net

The US National Security Agency has published today a guide on the benefits and risks of encrypted DNS protocols, such as DNS-over-HTTPS (DoH), which have become widely used over the past two years. The US cybersecurity agency warns that while technologies like DoH can encrypt and hide user DNS queries from network observers, they also have downsides when used inside corporate networks. "DoH is not a panacea," the NSA said in a security advisory [PDF] published today, claiming that the use of the protocol gives companies a false sense of security, echoing many of the arguments presented in a ZDNet feature on DoH in October 2019.

US agency taps Nokia for 5G security < Caution-https://www.lightreading.com/security/us-agency-taps-nokia-for-5g-security/d/d-id/766671 > (01/14) Light Reading
ESPOO, Finland – Nokia today announced it has been selected as a technology provider and collaborator by the National Cybersecurity Center of Excellence (NCCoE) 5G Cybersecurity Project. Nokia will work with NCCoE and other key vendors, including members from government and industry to ensure the transition from 4G to 5G networks is secure. Nokia was selected by NCCoE to participate in the project due to its global success in 5G networks – including hardware and software, and mobile network security and 5G RAN expertise – to help refine a reference design and build use cases on standards-based solutions.

Mobile network providers in the UK are moving ahead with the deployment of 5G and have announced a range of new locations across the country that can now benefit from next-generation connectivity, even if few of us can get out and use it. Mobile operator O2 said that it has surpassed the target of reaching 150 locations across the country with 5G connectivity, with new networks opening, among other spots, in Bournemouth, Cheltenham, Doncaster and Southampton. O2 also announced that it has increased its 5G coverage footprint in larger cities including London, Birmingham, Glasgow, Bristol, Liverpool and Manchester.

RANSOMWARE

3 tips on how to approach crypto ransomware < Caution-https://www.securitymagazine.com/articles/94348-tips-on-how-to-approach-crypto-ransomware > (01/14) Security Magazine
The virtual working environments of many employees during the pandemic have exposed numerous companies' vulnerabilities to the threat of ransomware. As more and more companies operate remotely, the number of threat actors targeting these businesses will continue to rise. Unsecure systems and unsuspecting employees are vulnerable to ransomware attacks. In fact, during the first half of this year, ransomware attacks increased by nearly 900%. Overall, 2020 has been a cybersecurity pandemic all its own, with a 72% increase in ransomware growth due to COVID-19.

EMERGENCY COMMUNICATIONS

Carbyne raises $25M for a next-generation platform to improve emergency 911 responses < Caution-https://techcrunch.com/2021/01/14/carbyne-raises-25m-for-a-next-generation-platform-to-improve-emergency-911-responses/ > (01/14) Tech Crunch

Emergency services continue to be a major force when it comes to coping with the COVID-19 health pandemic, and today a company that is building technology to help them run better is announcing a round of funding to continue expanding its business. Carbyne — an Israeli startup that has built a cloud-based platform aimed at emergency services to help them pinpoint more complete information about the people who are calling in, and to provide additional telemedicine services to start responding faster — has picked up $25 million.

Newsroom: Arlington Emergency Communications Center Leads Nation in Remote Call-Taking, Dispatching & Supervision < Caution-https://patch.com/virginia/arlington-va/newsroom-arlington-emergency-communications-center-leads-nation-remote-call > (01/14) Patch

On Wednesday, Jan. 13, the Arlington County Emergency Communications Center (ECC) became one of the first centers in the nation to implement capabilities that allow fire and emergency medical services (EMS) dispatchers and supervisors to deliver critical emergency communications services no matter where they are. Now, Arlington Fire-EMS dispatchers and supervisors are able work from a remote location, including from home. New capabilities in the 9-1-1 system allow for remote call-taking, dispatch, and supervision—breaking new ground in decentralizing and distributing public safety emergency communications.

In a press release on Thursday, the Department of Justice (DOJ) announced an indictment in Central Islip charging 14 high-ranking leaders from Mara Salvatrucha (MS-13) with terrorism offenses.

The defendants operated as MS-13's "board of directors," known as the Ranfla Nacional, who directed violence and criminal activity around the world for almost two decades.

Specifically, the indictment charges the defendants with conspiracy to provide and conceal material support to terrorists, conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism transcending national boundaries, conspiracy to finance terrorism, and narco-terrorism conspiracy in connection with the defendants' leadership of MS-13 from El Salvador, the United States, Mexico, and elsewhere.

A high-ranking DOJ official said, "The indictment announced today is the highest-reaching and most sweeping indictment targeting MS-13 and its command-and-control structure in U.S. history."

Justice Department Publishes Statement on 2016 President's Council of Advisors on Science and Technology Report

Today, the Justice Department published a statement on the 2016 President's Council of Advisors on Science and Technology (PCAST) Report, Forensic Science in Criminal Courts: Ensuring Scientific Validity of Feature-Comparison Methods. The statement is a response to PCAST's claims regarding what it described as forensic "feature comparison methods."

Published in September 2016, the PCAST report has been cited by several courts that have recently limited the scope of opinion testimony by firearms and toolmarks examiners regarding the source of a bullet or shell casing. These courts relied on certain aspects of the PCAST Report to support their decisions. In its Report, PCAST claimed that forensic "feature comparison" methods belong to the scientific discipline of metrology (measurement science); that feature comparison methods can only be deemed "foundationally valid" by adhering to PCAST's mandatory and non-severable set of experimental design criteria; and that error rates for feature comparison methods can only be established using these "appropriately designed" black box studies.

The Department disagrees with these claims and explains why they are erroneous. Specifically, it is the Department's position that:

- Traditional forensic pattern examination methods—as currently practiced—do not belong to the scientific discipline of metrology. Forensic examiners visually compare the individual features observed in two examined samples, they do not measure The result of this comparison is a conclusion that is stated in words (nominal terms), not magnitudes (measurements).
- PCAST's claim that forensic pattern examination methods can only be validated using its non-severable set of nine experimental design criteria is inconsistent with its own examples, international laboratory standards, and authorities in experimental design. There is no single scientifically recognized means by which to validate a scientific method.
- Casework error rates cannot be established through the exclusive and non-severable application of PCAST's experimental design criteria. No single error rate is applicable to all labs, examiners, or cases.

The full statement can be found here: U.S. Department of Justice Statement on the PCAST Report: Forensic Science in Criminal Courts: Ensuring Scientific Validity of Feature-Comparison Methods and a link to the abstract can be found here: U.S. Department of Justice Statement on the PCAST Report: Abstract.

MS-13's Highest-Ranking Leaders Charged with Terrorism Offenses in the United States

CENTRAL ISLIP, NY - Earlier today, an indictment was unsealed in Central Islip, New York charging 14 of the world's highest-ranking MS-13 leaders who are known today as the Ranfla Nacional, which operated as the Organization's Board of Directors, and directed MS-13's violence and criminal activity around the world for almost two decades.

Specifically, the indictment charges the defendants with conspiracy to provide and conceal material support to terrorists, conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism transcending national boundaries, conspiracy to finance terrorism and narco-terrorism conspiracy in connection with the defendants' leadership of the transnational criminal organization over the past two decades from El Salvador, the United States, Mexico and elsewhere.

Defendant Borromeo Enrique Henriquez, aka "Diablito de Hollywood," is widely recognized as the most powerful member of the Ranfla Nacional. Three of the indicted defendants, Fredy Ivan Jandres-Parada, aka "Lucky de Park View" and "Lacky de Park View," Cesar Humberto Lopez-Larios, aka "El Grenas de Stoners" and "Oso de Stoners," and Hugo Armando Quinteros-Mineros, aka "Flaco de Francis," remain at large and should be considered armed and dangerous. Members of the public with information concerning their whereabouts are strongly encouraged to contact the Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI) toll-free MS-13 tip line, 1-866-STP-MS13 (1-866-787-6713), or U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Homeland Security Investigations (HSI) at (866) 347-2423 or https://www.ice.gov/webform/ice-tip-form. Together, FBI and HSI have offered $20,000 in rewards for information leading to the arrest and conviction of each of the three fugitives. Henriquez and 10 other defendants are in custody in El Salvador. The United States will explore options for their extradition to the U.S. with the government of El Salvador.

Jeffrey A. Rosen, Acting Attorney General; Seth D. DuCharme, Acting U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of New York (EDNY); John J. Durham, Director of Joint Task Force Vulcan (JTFV); Christopher A. Wray, Director, FBI; and Derek Benner, Executive Associate Director, HSI, announced the unsealing of the indictment.

"The indictment announced today is the highest-reaching and most sweeping indictment targeting MS-13 and its command and control structure in U.S. history. When Attorney General Barr announced the creation of JTFV in August 2019, he envisioned a whole-of-government approach that would combine proven prosecution tools from the past with innovative strategies designed specifically to eliminate MS-13 leadership's ability to operate the gang and direct its terrorist activity. This indictment reflects an important step toward achieving that goal. By working side-by-side with our U.S. law enforcement partners and with our partners in El Salvador, we have charged MS-13's highest-ranking leaders with operating a transnational criminal organization that utilizes terror to impose their will on neighborhoods, businesses and innocent civilians across the United States and Central America," stated Acting Attorney General Rosen.

"MS-13 is responsible for a wave of death and violence that has terrorized communities, leaving neighborhoods on Long Island and throughout the Eastern District of New York awash in bloodshed," said Acting U.S. Attorney DuCharme. "Even when incarcerated, the Ranfla Nacional continued to direct MS-13's global operations, recruit new members, including children, into MS-13, and orchestrate murder and mayhem around the world. Today's ground-breaking indictment seeks to demolish MS-13 by targeting its command and control structure and holding MS-13's Board of Directors accountable for their terroristic actions."

"The FBI is committed to combatting all forms of terrorism that threaten the American people as well as our international partners," stated FBI Director Wray. "In collaboration with our federal, state, local and international partners, we took aggressive steps to target and pursue some of the highest levels of leadership of MS-13. This operation is a clear signal to others who engage in this type of transnational criminal activity: the FBI will work tirelessly to bring them to justice wherever they are based."

"For over a decade, HSI has remained steadfast in our resolve to dismantle transnational gangs like MS-13, stated HSI Executive Associate Director Benner. "As one of the most violent and dangerous criminal enterprises, MS-13 and La Ranfla Nacional were directly responsible for unthinkable violence and criminal activity in communities across the United States and throughout Central America. As a result of the hard work and substantial resources dedicated to Joint Task Force Vulcan by our domestic and international law enforcement partners, this indictment will have a lasting disruptive effect on the future global illicit activities of this transnational criminal organization."

As alleged in the indictment, the Ranfla Nacional comprises the highest level of leadership of MS-13. In approximately 2002, the defendants and other MS-13 leaders began establishing a highly-organized, hierarchical command and control structure as a means to effectuate their decisions and enforce their orders, even while in prison. They directed acts of violence and murder in El Salvador, the United States, and elsewhere, established military-style training camps for its members and obtained military weapons such as rifles, handguns, grenades, improvised explosive devices (IED) and rocket launchers. As leaders of MS-13, the defendants controlled swaths of territory and engaged in public relations efforts on behalf of the transnational criminal organization. Further, the defendants used MS-13's large membership in the United States to engage in criminal activities, such as drug trafficking and extortion to raise money to support MS-13's terrorist activities in El Salvador and elsewhere, and directed members in the United States to commit acts of violence, including murders, to further its goals.

As further alleged in the indictment, a central theme of the rules implemented by the Ranfla Nacional was the requirement of loyalty to MS-13, or to the "barrio." The requirement for loyalty was central to all aspects of life for MS-13 members. Members who disobeyed the rules, showed disloyalty to the gang or to its leaders, cooperated with law enforcement, or disrespected other members were subject to severe punishment, including death. The rules put in place by the Ranfla Nacional allowed the gang to flourish in parts of the United States, including within the EDNY where, under the defendants' command, MS-13 has committed numerous acts of violence—including murders, attempted murders, assaults, kidnappings, drug trafficking, extortion of individuals and businesses, obstructed justice and sent dues and the proceeds of criminal activity by wire transfer to MS-13 leaders in El Salvador.

As further outlined in the indictment, the Ranfla Nacional has exercised its power over the Government of El Salvador by committing acts of violence and intimidation over government officials, law enforcement and the population of El Salvador at large. In doing so the Ranfla Nacional has ordered the killing of law enforcement and government officials in El Salvador as well as ordering a "green light," or killing, of a FBI Special Agent detailed to El Salvador investigating MS-13 and its members. Moreover, by controlling the level of MS-13's violence, the Ranfla Nacional exercised leverage with the Government of El Salvador. For example, as alleged in the indictment, from approximately 2012 until approximately 2015, the Ranfla Nacional entered into a "truce" with the then-Government of El Salvador. As part of this agreement, the Ranfla Nacional directed MS-13 to reduce homicides in El Salvador in exchange for improved prison conditions, benefits and cash payments. In 2015, when this agreement collapsed, the Ranfla Nacional blamed the United States, believing that the U.S. government pressured the government of El Salvador to end the "truce" as a condition of receiving funds from the United States. Thereafter, in early 2016, the Ranfla Nacional began planning for a major campaign of coordinated violence in El Salvador in retaliation for the harsher measures imposed on its members after the end of the "truce." As alleged in the indictment, the defendants ordered all cliques in El Salvador to create a specialized unit of MS-13 members to target police officers, military members, and government officials in El Salvador. These members underwent military training at MS-13 military training camps in El Salvador. The defendants also ordered all cliques, including those in the United States and in the EDNY, to provide profits from their MS-13-related criminal activity to be used to purchase weapons for the planned attacks on police in El Salvador. In total, the defendants collected over $600,000 U.S. dollars for this fund which was used to purchase weapons, including M-16s and M-60 machine guns, grenades, IEDs, and rocket launchers. Furthermore, the defendants ordered increased violence, including murders, in the EDNY and other parts of the United States, which saw a dramatic increase in MS-13 violence in 2016 and 2017.

Finally, as alleged in the indictment, the Ranfla Nacional directed the expansion of MS-13 activities around the world, most significantly into Mexico, where several high-ranking leaders were sent to organize operations there. In Mexico, MS-13 leaders made connections to obtain narcotics and firearms, conducted business with Mexican drug cartels such as the Zetas, Gulf Cartel, Cártel de Jalisco Nueva Generación (CJNG) and Sinaloa Cartel, and engaged in human trafficking and smuggling.

In August 2019, Attorney General William P. Barr created JTFV to carry out the recommendations of the MS-13 Subcommittee formed under the Attorney General's Transnational Organized Crime Task Force (TOC Task Force). The Attorney General's TOC Task Force resulted from President Donald J. Trump's February 2017 Executive Order directing the Departments of Justice, State, and Homeland Security, and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence to coordinate a whole-of-government approach to dismantle transnational criminal organizations, such as MS-13, and increase the safety of the American people.

Since its creation, JTFV has successfully implemented a whole-of-government approach to combatting MS-13, including increasing coordination and collaboration with foreign law enforcement partners, including El Salvador, Mexico, Honduras and Guatemala; designating priority MS-13 programs, cliques and leaders, who have the most impact on the United States, for targeted prosecutions; and coordinating significant MS-13 indictments in U.S. Attorney's Offices across the country, including the first use of national security charges against MS-13 leaders.

JTFV has been comprised of members from the Department of Justice's National Security Division and the Criminal Division, as well as U.S. Attorney's Offices across the country, including the EDNY; the District of New Jersey; the Northern District of Ohio; the District of Utah; the Eastern District of Virginia; the District of Massachusetts; the Eastern District of Texas; the Southern District of New York; the District of Alaska; the Southern District of Florida; the Southern District of California; the District of Nevada; and the District of Columbia. In addition, all Department of Justice law enforcement agencies are involved in the effort, including the FBI; the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the U.S. Marshals Service; and the U.S. Bureau of Prisons. In addition, HSI also plays a critical role in JTFV.

Acting Attorney General Rosen expressed his sincere thanks to Attorney General Raul Melara of El Salvador for the assistance of his office, as well as investigators from El Salvador's Policía Nacional Civil, Centro Antipandilla Transnacional unit for their invaluable cooperation. Additionally, numerous Department of Justice components contributed to this indictment, including: the National Security Division's Counterterrorism Section; the Justice Department's Office of International Affairs; the Criminal Division's Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training; and Organized Crime and Gang Section; and the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Forces Executive Office. Finally, consistent with President Trump's Executive Order and the Attorney General's whole of government approach, the Department of State has provided critical support for JTFV's mission.

The charges announced today are allegations, and the defendants are presumed innocent unless and until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt in a court of law. If convicted, the defendants face a maximum sentence of life in prison.

The government's case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorneys James Donnelly, Matthew Shepherd and Stewart Young from JTFV, and Assistant U.S. Attorneys Paul G. Scotti, Justina L. Geraci and Megan E. Farrell from the EDNY's Long Island Criminal Division.

POST-ELECTION TRAJECTORIES FOR RIGHT-WING MOBILIZATION IN THE US

About the US Crisis Monitor

The US Crisis Monitor supports data-driven initiatives to build community resilience and facilitate efforts to track, prevent, and mitigate political violence in America. A joint project of the Armed Conflict Location & Event Data Project (ACLED) and the Bridging Divides Initiative (BDI) at Princeton University, the US Crisis Monitor provides the public with real-time data and analysis on political violence and demonstrations around the country, establishing an evidence base from which to identify risks, hotspots, and available resources to empower local communities in times of crisis.

Introduction

More than 150 million Americans cast ballots in the 2020 presidential election, setting a new record even as the COVID-19 crisis intensified (CNBC, 4 November 2020). Despite the heightened risk of political violence going into the vote (NPR, 22 October 2020), government officials, civil society organizations, and local communities organized to address the threat, with limited interference on Election Day and a peaceful resolution by the end of the week, as former Vice President Joe Biden was projected by national media to be the victor (VOA, 7 November 2020).

The results were immediately disputed. Tensions increased as it became apparent that a decisive outcome would be delayed beyond Election Day due to logistical challenges posed by the pandemic. Current President Donald Trump declared without evidence that the election was being "stolen," prompting a surge in protests outside vote-counting centers as well as threats against election officials (PBS, 17 November 2020). On the right, tensions persist amid a combined legal and disinformation campaign to discredit the process and to overturn Biden's victory. According to a late November poll from the Economist and YouGov, almost 90% of Trump voters believe the election result is illegitimate (Economist, 21 November 2020),[1] a finding echoed by a range of concurrent surveys (Newsweek, 10 November 2020; Politico, 9 November 2020). And just 27 of 249 Republicans in Congress — or 10% — have acknowledged Biden's win as of early December (Washington Post, 5 December 2020). As the president refuses to concede, hundreds of 'Stop the Steal' protests have been organized across the country, in which militias[2] and armed actors have taken an enlarged role. Members of right-wing armed groups like the Oath Keepers have announced that they will never recognize a Biden presidency, and are committed to resisting the administration's policies (Independent, 15 November 2020).

While the legal pathways to a second term have all but entirely closed for President Trump, with recounts confirming Biden's win and court cases producing no evidence of mass voter fraud, he has not formally conceded. Although the Trump administration has allowed the Biden team to begin the transition process, the president continues to hold rallies against the so-called "rigged election" and has called on Republican legislators in states like Georgia to appoint pro-Trump electors to the Electoral College (ABC News, 7 December 2020). Under these murky circumstances, where Trump supporters believe they have either lost the election or are at high risk of seeing the election stolen, right-wing mobilization is likely to spike relative to a clear electoral defeat and concession.

Building on the assumption that backers of a losing candidate are more likely to mobilize during the post-election period — particularly when a subset of the losing candidate's support base is organized, armed, and has a demonstrated capacity for violence — this report analyzes the potential for persistent

[2] Around the world, ACLED defines militias, which are a large and diverse range of actors, as armed and organized violent groups that are extra-legal — meaning they are, by definition, extra-military, extra-state, non-institutional entities. While some of these groups may be pro-government, they need not be. Those which are pro-government often only have indirect links to the state, yet may mobilize and operate with the assistance of important allies, including factions within the state. "[Pro-government militias] are made possible by a political culture that allows for unaccountable agents and actions. They present a serious threat because of the support they receive from state elites allowing them to perpetrate violence on behalf of those elites with impunity" (Raleigh & Kishi, 2018). ACLED chooses to use the same terminology — the word 'militia' — for all regions of global coverage, particularly to underline the consistencies in the activities and incentives of such actors across geographic regions. For more on ACLED definitions, see the ACLED Codebook.

right-wing unrest through the inauguration and beyond. Reviewing new ACLED data[3] covering the past seven months of political violence and demonstration activity, the report tracks key shifts in unrest from the start of the summer to the election and its aftermath. The risk of political violence in the coming weeks will be influenced by the type and degree of organized right-wing opposition to the incoming administration, as well as the efficacy of peacebuilding and violence mitigation efforts aimed at reducing polarization, fighting disinformation, and bridging partisan divides. ACLED analysis identifies four main trajectories through which right-wing mobilization could lead to violence in the post-election period (see table):

1. If right-wing demonstrations are limited largely to militia groups, especially national movements, then the risk of large-scale violence increases, namely events with multiple active shooters. This scenario is more likely in locations where mobilization is linked to local militia groups with histories of high levels of activity.
2. If demonstrations primarily involve the mass mobilization of decentralized, armed individuals, then the risk of small-scale, individualized violence will increase. This is a more likely scenario in locations experiencing left-wing protests or where new gun regulations are under consideration by local or state governments.
3. If demonstrations are frequently targeted by violent sole perpetrators, as seen in a rise in concurrent or post-protest car rammings, aggressive individual attackers, or 'leaderless resistance' modalities, then the risk of widespread individualized violence will increase. This is a more likely scenario in sites of sustained political uprisings or enduring local tension — such as areas where well-organized Black Lives Matter or leftist activism has persisted beyond the summer and into the fall.
4. If demonstrations are predominantly driven by unarmed mass mobilization of broadly unaffiliated, and heterogenous right-wing protesters, then the risk of lethal violence will decrease, while the risk of street-fighting, especially brawls with counter-protesters, will increase. This scenario is unlikely to manifest for sustained periods of time, but is more likely to take hold in areas where local and national actors perceive high levels of election fraud.

[3] ACLED coverage of the US has now been extended to the start of May 2020. Access here.

Potential trajectories for right-wing mobilization and violence in the post-election period

Trajectory	Likelihood (Short-term)	Likelihood (Medium-term)	Potential for Violence	Locations at Highest Risk
(1) Militia groups	Low	Moderate	Low to Moderate	Locations where mobilization is linked to local militia groups with histories of high levels of activity (e.g. Lansing, Michigan)
(2) Decentralized armed individuals	Moderate	Low	Moderate	Locations experiencing left-wing protests or where gun restrictions are under consideration by local or state governments (e.g. Richmond, Virginia)
(3) Violent sole perpetrators	High	High	High	Areas that have sustained uprising activity or enduring local political tension (e.g. Portland, Oregon)
(4) Unarmed mass mobilization	Very High	Very High	Low	Areas where election fraud is perceived by local and national actors (e.g. Atlanta, Georgia)

Shifting Trends: Pre- and Post-Election

Dominant Protest Movements

Demonstrations surged over the summer ahead of the general election, particularly in the immediate aftermath of George Floyd's killing by police in Minneapolis. Floyd's death at the end of May sparked a new phase of protests associated with Black Lives Matter (BLM), a movement challenging police violence and structural racism in America, which led to thousands of demonstrations around the country. While media coverage has focused on cases of looting and vandalism, fueling right-wing disinformation campaigns aimed at mischaracterizing BLM activists as "violent extremists" (ADL, 2020), the vast majority of demonstrations associated with the movement have remained peaceful. Although ACLED data indicate that 94% of these demonstrations have involved no violent or destructive activity as of late November,[4] a contemporaneous Civiqs poll measuring support for BLM found that 38% of total respondents — and 47% of white respondents — were opposed to the movement, even as support has remained high among Black and Hispanic communities (Civiqs, 29 November 2020). A similar poll in mid-September found that just 16% of White Republicans expressed support for the movement (Pew Research Center, 16 September 2020).

Against this backdrop, demonstrations associated with the BLM movement have been disproportionately met with government intervention compared to other types of protests. When authorities have engaged BLM-linked demonstrations, they have also disproportionately used force to disperse the demonstrators (for more information, see ACLED's report on demonstrations and political violence trends throughout summer 2020). Thousands have been arrested in what activists have decried as a "deliberate crackdown" (Al Jazeera, 16 November 2020), with reports that those detained have faced excessive charges threatening long prison terms, a "suppression tactic" used to discourage mobilization (The Guardian, 16 August 2020).

Under pressure from the heavy-handed state reaction, the number of demonstration events associated with the BLM movement has declined in the weeks and months following Floyd's death. Such a response — particularly the use of force against demonstrators, harsh consequences for those arrested, and intimidation by armed extra-legal actors like militia groups — can alter the incentives of participants in mass movements like BLM. Due to factors like protest fatigue, social movements are rarely able to sustain high levels of mass mobilization over time. In light of these trends, the diminished levels of BLM-linked demonstration activity since the initial spike in May is not surprising (see navy line in graph below). Nevertheless, demonstrations associated with the BLM movement continue, and have taken on a very local focus in recent weeks — such as multi-day protests in Omaha, Nebraska in response to the death of [4] This activity includes violently disruptive and/or destructive acts targeting other individuals, property, businesses, other rioting groups, or armed actors. Such demonstrations can involve engagement in violence (e.g. clashes with police), vandalism (e.g. property destruction), looting, road-blocking using barricades, or burning materials like tires, among other activities. It is important to note that this category includes events where violence may have been initially instigated by the demonstrators as well as events where violence may have been initially instigated by police or other actors engaging the demonstrators. The Protest Spectrum: Types of Right- and Left-Wing Demonstration Events

For the purpose of this analysis, right-wing demonstrations encompass a range of distinct but interrelated movements, including: pro-Trump or anti-Biden rallies, as well as events that involve or express support for the Republican Party; pro-police demonstrations, such as those that involve supporters of the 'Back the Blue' or 'Blue Lives Matter' movements, which often organize as counter-protests against demonstrations associated with the BLM movement; demonstrations that involve QAnon conspiracy theory supporters or protesters associated with the 'Save Our Children' movement; protests that involve members of right-wing militias or street movements[8] either actively participating or standing by to 'keep the peace' during an event; and 'Stop the Steal' demonstrations, which have specifically emerged in the post-election period.

In contrast, demonstrations associated with the left-wing include protests that are anti-Trump or pro-Biden, as well as those involving or supporting the Democratic Party; those associated with the BLM movement advocating for an end to police violence and structural racism; those associated with Antifa; those involving left-leaning groups such as Abolish ICE, the NAACP, or the Democratic Socialists of America; and 'Count Every Vote' demonstrations, which have specifically emerged during the election period. Unlike demonstrations associated with the right-wing, which authorities attempt to disperse under 4% of the time, demonstrations associated with the left-wing are met with government intervention over 9% of the time. When authorities engage demonstrations associated with the right-wing, they use force nearly one-third or 34% of the time. Meanwhile, authorities use force in demonstrations associated with the left-wing over half or 51% of the time.

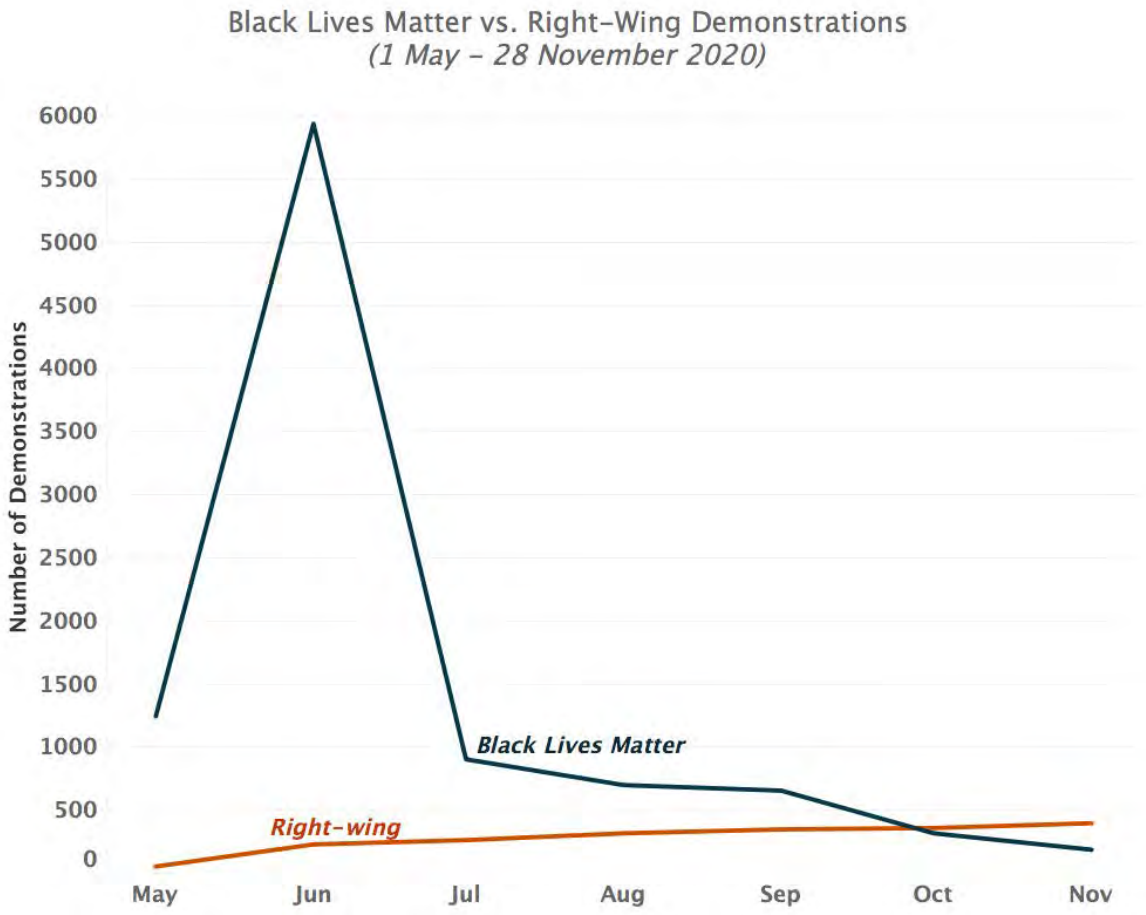
[5] Kenneth Jones was a Black man shot by two Omaha police officers during a traffic stop on 19 November (NBC News, 23 November 2020). The incident occurred during a traffic stop initiated by the two officers after they spotted a car with four occupants stopped in the middle of the road without emergency flashers activated. According to police, after Jones failed to comply with verbal commands to put his hands in the air, the two officers forcibly pulled him out of the car (KETV, 24 November 2020). One of the officers then reportedly saw a gun on Jones, prompting the officers to fire four shots at him (NBC News, 22 November 2020).

[6] Rodney Applewhite was an unarmed Black man killed by police on 19 November during a traffic stop while driving through rural New Mexico to his mother's house in Arizona for Thanksgiving. Police allege that Applewhite attempted to reach for the gun of an officer, though no further details have been provided (Santa Fe New Mexican, 30 November 2020).

[7] Stavian Rodriguez was a 15-year-old Latino teen killed by police after a failed armed robbery. Video of the incident appears to show Rodriguez with his hands up and his weapon on the ground when several shots were fired at him (KOCO, 25 November 2020).

[8] Street movements are defined as a social movement predominantly taking to the street or public square to demonstrate or make their views known. These movements can range from peaceful and those favoring social justice, to violent and racist. The common factor is that presence on the street at crucial gatherings marks a primary form of political programming and activity (though is not always the sole modality for engagement). Contemporary right-wing street movements in the United States usually privilege street fighting and attacks on dissent as their usual organizing, though some do not engage in this type of response.

Meanwhile, right-wing demonstrations (see inset box for definition) have followed a different pattern, both in levels of activity and state response. Right-wing mobilization increased in the lead-up to the election and surpassed the number of BLM-linked demonstrations (see brown line in graph below). Yet right-wing demonstration activity has met with very limited government intervention, underscoring how these events consistently face low levels of force, rare arrests, minimal legal consequences, and infrequent intimidation by armed extra-legal entities,[9] particularly when compared with their left-wing and BLM counterparts. Armed and violent contingents like the Proud Boys, who previously responded to President Trump's order to "stand back, stand by" (Associated Press, 30 September 2020), have declared that the standby order has been "rescinded" in the post-election period (Forbes, 7 November 2020). Street-fighting has broken out at multiple demonstrations involving Proud Boys around the country since the election, including in North Carolina, New York, California, and Washington, DC (Daily Kos, 3 December 2020).



[9] On 3 December, Grand Master Jay, the leader of the Not Fucking Around Coalition (NFAC), was arrested on federal charges for allegedly pointing a gun at officers stationed on a roof in downtown Louisville during his group's gathering on 4 September (Associated Press, 3 December 2020). While the NFAC is an armed, organized, extra-legal group, it is distinct from most other militias in the US context in that it is a burgeoning Black separatist movement that, in many ways, is a direct reaction to many right-wing groups. The arrest of Jay is a rare example of an alleged 'militia' member being arrested for activities that took place at a demonstration in which they participated. Other arrests of predominantly white militia groups, like that of the Wolverine Watchmen, arrested for the plotted kidnapping of Michigan Governor Gretchen Whitmer (Associated Press, 8 October 2020), are often tied to either actuated violence or an alleged unity of purpose towards committing violence in the future. Even the armed Black movement known as BLM757 based out of Richmond, Virginia shared in a press conference in Newport News, Virginia that they were only allowed to speak without intervention outside of a police precinct because of Boogaloo Boi Mike Dunn's militia on the scene (News2Share, 15 October 2020). Relatedly, in the same state, a mostly white gathering of 2nd Amendment activists and militia groups gathered in Richmond at the beginning of the year for a Lobby Day event organized by the far-right Virginia Citizens Defense League (VCDL) and actively broke local gun ordinances while police looked on (Reuters, 20 January 2020; MilitiaWatch, 16 April 2020). The VCDL is already planning a similar engagement in 2021, for which militia and other right-wing activists are likely to show up, this time for a car rally (Virginia Star, 30 November 2020).

Demonstrations associated with the right-wing have been met with law enforcement intervention far less frequently relative to BLM-linked demonstrations: under 4% of events, compared to nearly 10% of events. When authorities have engaged demonstrations associated with BLM, they have used force — such as firing less-lethal weapons like tear gas, rubber bullets, and pepper spray or beating demonstrators with batons — more than 51% of the time, compared to only 34% for right-wing demonstrations (see graph below).[10]

[10] As noted above, nearly 94% of demonstrations associated with the BLM movement involved no violent or destructive activity as of late November, meaning that such activity was reported in 6% of demonstrations. It is important to note that this 6% includes both those demonstrations in which demonstrators may have engaged in such activity, and were then met with use of force by authorities, as well as cases in which law enforcement used force against peaceful protesters who only responded violently as a result of police engagement. Provocative activity by law enforcement — such as showing up to peaceful events with riot gear, or using tactics like kettling in which protesters are cornered — has been common. ACLED does not systematically code these dynamics, including who initiated violence, given the limitations and biases in reporting on these factors (though available information is included in the 'Notes' section in ACLED data). Notably, even if all demonstrations in which BLM-associated demonstrators reportedly engaged in looting, vandalism, or violence are excluded from analysis — if the assumption were to be that the use of force by authorities under such circumstances is 'warranted' — nearly 5% of all peaceful BLM-linked protests were met with law enforcement intervention, and over 37% of these events saw the use of force by authorities. In comparison, less than 3% of peaceful right-wing protests were met with law enforcement intervention, and only 18% of these events saw the use of force by authorities. These trends suggest that government intervention and use of force are not merely set responses to demonstrator behavior, but rather part of a broader attitude, policy, or strategic approach to different types of mobilization in different local, state, and national contexts.

Armed Group Activity

Militias and street movements have become increasingly active in right-wing demonstrations this year. Over the summer, right-wing militias primarily mobilized in response to the BLM movement and pandemic-related public health restrictions. In the run-up to the election, militias additionally organized around perceived threats to the sanctity of the election such as mass voter fraud, with groups like the Oath Keepers warning that they would arrive at polling stations and use violence if necessary to "protect" the vote from being "stolen" (Media Matters, 28 October 2020; NPR, 31 October 2020). A proactive approach by civil society groups and government officials aimed at preventing the threat of armed intimidation at the polls — including an "extremism crackdown" by federal law enforcement in Michigan (Detroit News, 29 October 2020) and the arrest of a Proud Boys member who threatened to blow up a polling location in North Dakota (Daily Beast, 30 October 2020) — may have reduced the risk of violence and resulted in limited militia activity on Election Day (USA Today, 3 November 2020).

Compounding the effects of increased attention and preventative measures aimed at mitigating the risk of militia activity at the polls, the strategic incentive for these groups to ramp up operations on Election Day itself decreased as the vote approached, particularly compared to the pre- and post-election periods. This is in part due to their overriding focus on perceived attacks against the sanctity of the election, such as 'deviations' like mass mail-in voting during the pandemic. Large-scale violence against polling centers on Election Day would undermine that sanctity and challenge the right-wing narrative that in-person voting was more valid than mail-in voting — a narrative pushed by the Trump administration, which actively discouraged voting by mail based on debunked allegations that the process is exceptionally vulnerable to fraud (Washington Post, 11 September 2020). Trends suggest that those voting in person on Election Day were disproportionately Republican supporters, with Democrats being more likely to have taken advantage of mail-in or early voting (FiveThirtyEight, 28 August 2020; The Hill, 15 September 2020), diminishing the incentive for militia groups to target polling centers filled with 'legitimate' right-wing voters on Election Day.

ACLED analysis of militia activity during elections around the world finds that these incentives change over the course of the electoral period: before the vote, armed groups have an incentive to intimidate and suppress voters, while afterward this incentive shifts to challenging election results and ballot counting. Joint research conducted by ACLED and MilitiaWatch prior to the US election outlined multiple factors that raise the risk of militia activity before, during, and after the vote, including perceptions of leftist coup activities — i.e. 'stealing' an election — as well as highly competitive votes in swing states — i.e. states where vote counting appears to be very close or delayed (for more, see the ACLED and MilitiaWatch joint report). Many of these drivers emerged on or after Election Day, contributing to the rise in right-wing protest activity in the aftermath of the vote and the increased role for militia groups within these demonstrations.

Late on the night of the election, when the preliminary results began to indicate that President-elect Biden was likely to win, President Trump sent out a tweet claiming that the vote was being "stolen," without presenting evidence (Vox, 4 November 2020). In response, a 'Stop the Steal' demonstration campaign quickly took form, with participants demanding the rejection of votes perceived to be illegitimate, such as predominantly Democratic mail-in ballots (see map below). These demonstrations, encouraged by the executive branch and many right-wing media outlets, rapidly spread across the country, often met with counter-protesters calling on officials to 'Count Every Vote.'[11] Militias and armed individuals have been disproportionately active in 'Stop the Steal' demonstrations compared to other demonstrations.

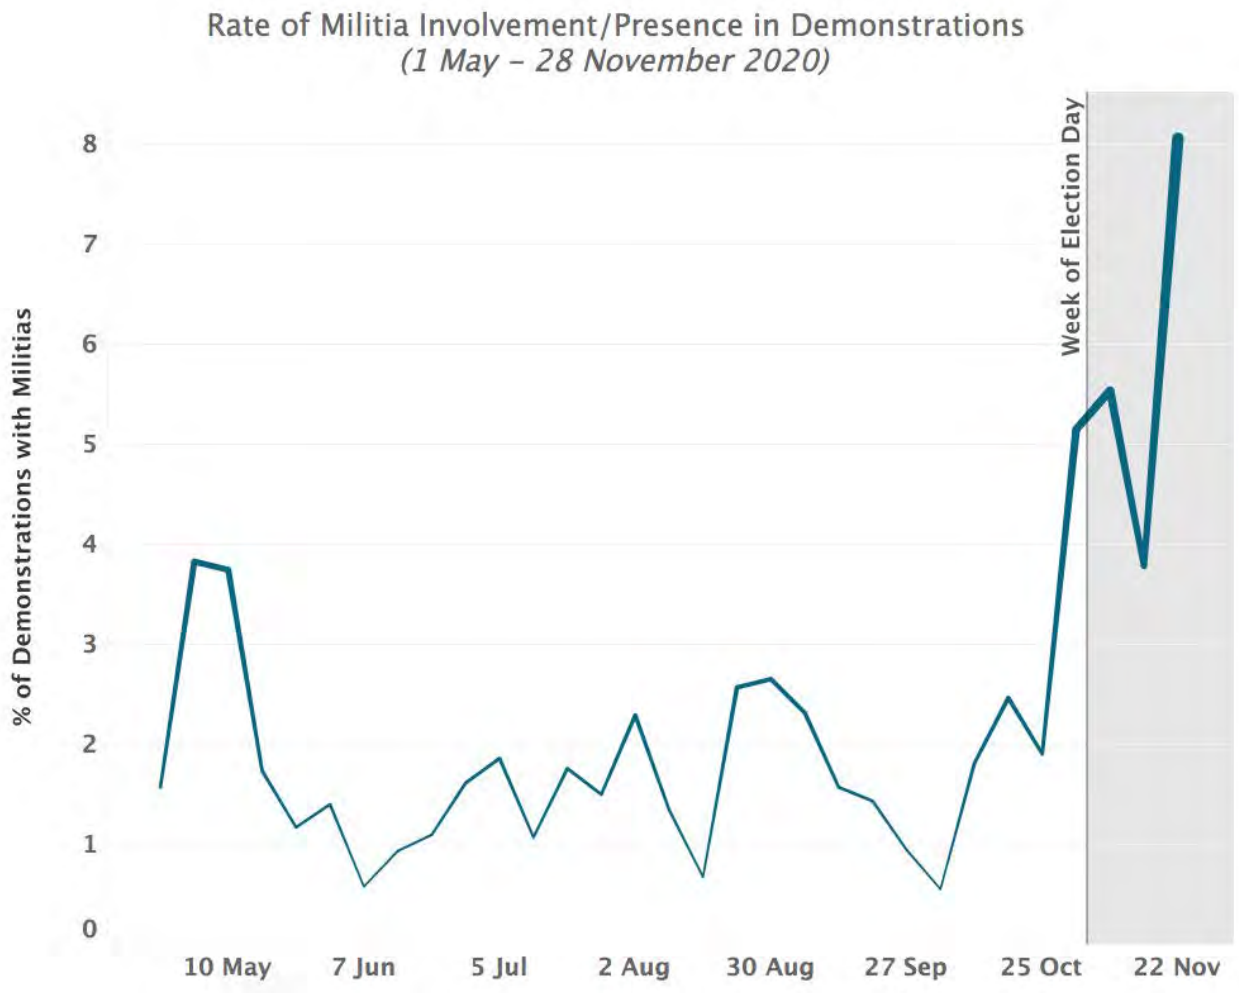
As the movement escalated in the immediate aftermath of Election Day, the total percentage of demonstrations involving militias — both those in which they actively participated, as well as those they attended to 'keep the peace' — has also risen dramatically (see graph below). The increased rate of armed, organized, and mobilized militia members active at demonstrations around the country amplifies the latent threat of violence.

[11] Many 'Count Every Vote' rallies were pre-planned ahead of election week in anticipation of a long vote-counting period, while others emerged as counter-protests to 'Stop the Steal' demonstrations.



While demonstrations involving militias peaked in June in terms of gross numbers and then declined, they have since surged to roughly the same level in November. Right-wing mobilization is often posited as 'reactive,' in that it occurs in response to mobilization by the left. In June, the increase in involvement by right-wing militias in demonstrations can be seen as a reaction to the mass mobilization of the BLM movement (i.e. 'leftist organizing') — demonstrations associated with the BLM movement were at their height in the weeks following Floyd's killing at the end of May. Meanwhile, in November, the spike in right-wing militia involvement in demonstrations can be seen as a reaction to perceived 'leftist coup behavior' in the form of an attempt to 'steal the election.'

Unsurprisingly, 'Stop the Steal' demonstrations have been disproportionately competitive compared to other types of demonstrations, meaning that a high number of counter-protests, such as 'Count Every Vote' rallies, have also been present. Nearly one-third — or 32% — of 'Stop the Steal' demonstrations have involved counter-protests.[12] This contrasts with only 9% of all 'Count Every Vote' demonstrations, less than 6% of demonstrations associated with the BLM movement, and just over 5% of demonstrations at large.

[12] If two protests occur at the same time, in the same place, and they are essentially 'counter' to one another, then the events are coded as a single event instead of as two separate events. While ACLED will code the two parties, ACLED does not code which side may have shown up first, or who is countering whom. Such information is limited and often biased in reporting. To the extent such information is noted in sources, it will be noted in the 'Notes' section of the data for users. Discussion of 'counter-protests' here refers to cases in which 'Stop the Steal' demonstrators showed up to protest and 'counter' another group as well as cases in which 'Stop the Steal' demonstrators were protesting and others showed up to 'counter' them. It is a measure of how 'competitive' such demonstrators can be, especially relative to demonstrations around other issues. Sometimes, other parties, such as police, may get involved in counter-protests — on behalf of one side or the other, or to 'keep the peace.' In such cases, police may be coded as one of the primary actors; ACLED defaults to coding the more important engagement in each event. Nevertheless, all events that capture a counter-demonstration include a 'tag' in the 'Notes', stylized as "[counter-protest]", which can be used to identify all counter-demonstrations. For answers to frequently asked questions about ACLED coding methodology in the US context, see these FAQs.

Potential Trajectories

The current trends in political violence and demonstration activity in post-election America are not a direct continuation of the trends identified over the summer: there has been a significant shift in the leading protest actors, the involvement of armed groups and individuals, and how they are in turn met by the authorities. Likewise, ACLED data do not indicate that these current trends will remain static through to the inauguration and initial stages of the next administration. The risk of political violence and unrest in the coming weeks will be influenced by the type and degree of organized right-wing opposition to the incoming administration, as well as the efficacy of peacebuilding and violence mitigation efforts aimed at reducing polarization, fighting disinformation, and bridging partisan divides. ACLED analysis identifies four main trajectories through which right-wing mobilization could lead to violence in the post-election period:

1. If right-wing demonstrations are limited largely to militia groups, especially national movements, then the risk of large-scale violence increases, namely events with multiple active shooters. This scenario is more likely in locations where mobilization is linked to local militia groups with histories of high levels of activity.
2. If demonstrations primarily involve the mass mobilization of decentralized, armed individuals, then the risk of small-scale, individualized violence will increase. This is a more likely scenario in locations experiencing left-wing protests or where new gun regulations are under consideration by local or state governments.
3. If demonstrations are frequently targeted by violent sole perpetrators, as seen in a rise in concurrent or post-protest car rammings, aggressive individual attackers, or 'leaderless resistance' modalities, then the risk of widespread individualized violence will increase. This is a more likely scenario in sites of sustained political uprisings or enduring local tension — such as areas where well-organized Black Lives Matter or leftist activism has persisted beyond the summer and into the fall.
4. If demonstrations are predominantly driven by unarmed mass mobilization of broadly unaffiliated, and heterogenous right-wing protesters, then the risk of lethal violence will decrease, while the risk of street-fighting, especially brawls with counter-protesters, will increase. This scenario is unlikely to manifest for sustained periods of time, but is more likely to take hold in areas where local and national actors perceive high levels of election fraud.

(1) Demonstrations limited largely to militia groups

If right-wing demonstrations are limited largely to militia groups, then there will be a higher risk of mass violence.[13] This is especially the case if national movements become increasingly involved in demonstration activity. National groups, especially relative to local, non-affiliated movements, tend to be more extreme ideologically among their members. With 'Stop the Steal' demonstrations, there has already been disproportionate engagement by militia groups relative to other protests: militia groups have participated in 18% of all 'Stop the Steal' demonstrations, while they have engaged in less than 1% of all other demonstrations (see graph below).[14] For example, the day after the election, in Phoenix, Arizona, a member of AZ Patriots entered the Maricopa County Recorder's Office by impersonating a member of the press, live-streaming an allegation that the county had used a sharpie to invalidate ballots before being removed from the building. Following this allegation, more than 200 people — including members of AZ Patriots and III%ers, among others — rallied outside the ballot-counting facility in support of President Trump, alleging that some ballots had been improperly counted (Washington Post, 5 November 2020). The following day, Proud Boys were reportedly present at a 'Stop the Steal' protest in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania (WHYY-FM, 5 November 2020; Twitter, 5 November 2020).

[13] A higher risk is not equivalent to actual occurrence and does not convey certainty. Rather, the assessment indicates that there is a higher possibility or probability of an occurrence. Looking to lessons learned from contexts elsewhere in the world, large numbers of highly organized, mobilized, and armed individuals will increase the likelihood of mass violence.

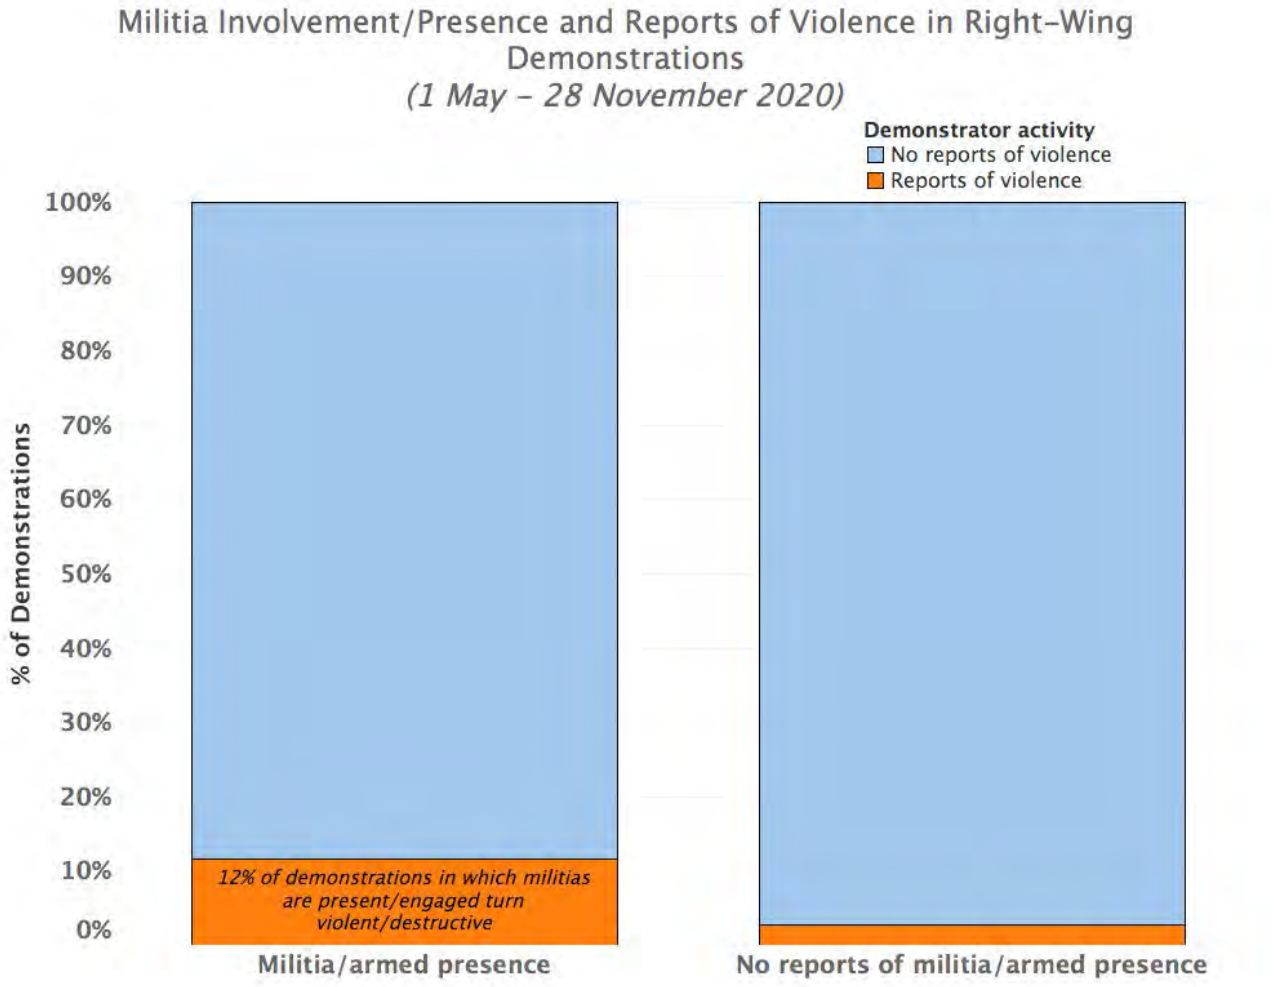
Recent militia-driven mobilizations have set their sights on state government leaders. In Atlanta, the III% Security Force militia has been highly involved in 'Stop the Steal' gatherings but has also organized multiple November weekend 'MAGA Drag' caravans outside the homes of Republican officials as well (Vanity Fair, 7 December 2020). In Michigan, local armed groups gathered outside the home of Michigan Secretary of State Jocelyn Benson's home on the night of 5 December, which Benson described as an act "done with the primary purpose of intimidation of public officials" (Metro Times, 7 December 2020).

[14] While the trend is already clear, it is surely an undercount: many militia groups are organizing and attending these demonstrations outside of the mantle of their 'public militia affiliation' and instead as more quotidien unarmed protesters. This is likely due to a mix of reasons, from the additional organizational energy required to show up as a militia group, individual interests to show up at a protest not solely as an armed supporter, and the perceived urgency to join street or caravan movements. One other reason for this is the existence of 'gun-free' zones or areas that do not allow open carry — areas that without major organizing usually dissuade people from showing up armed to protest.

In addition to engagement in demonstrations, the number of recruitment and training events involving militias also remains higher than average relative to the last seven months. As some militia groups have involved themselves directly in the 'Stop the Steal' movement — such as the III% Security Force and the Oath Keepers — this concurrent rise in recruitment and training is to be expected given its strategic advantage.

Current trends indicate that when militias are involved in right-wing demonstrations, the demonstrations tend to turn violent or destructive more frequently — 12% of the time — relative to other right-wing demonstrations in which militias are not directly involved — less than 3% of the time (see graph below). In this sense, the presence of a militia at a demonstration increases the risk of violent or destructive activity even before the event begins.



Members of militia groups have become more primed for acting in the streets and explicitly on behalf of a political party, further reinvigorating an American far-right that has already been engaging in more aggressive speech and organizing online since the start of the summer. The election has been an important signpost and driver for militias, and it likely speaks to the internal turmoil of many groups that there has not been greater street organizing given their online communications around and after the election. Many within the militia milieu are highly suspicious and competitive of one another, for example, and groups are often prone to splinters, reformations, and internal coups over lines of communication and membership (MilitiaWatch, 15 June 2019; MilitiaWatch, 11 September 2020). Coalition-building has been a major difficulty for many on the far-right in recent years, especially after the fallout of the right-wing killing of antifascist activist Heather Heyer at the Unite the Right rally in Charlottesville, Virginia in 2017 (NBC News, 7 December 2018).

There are signs that this pattern could change. 'Stop the Steal' demonstrations, and election-related demonstrations more largely, are attracting multiple militia groups, with participants either organizing in tandem or organically responding to the same event as a mobilizing factor. New coalitions are likely already being built during these rallies — which have put online fascists and militia leaders in the same organizing space once more (see section below on Unarmed Mass Mobilization). Online communications on and around local and national elections for many of these communities have been rife with call-to-action posts and discussion of the need to 'get organized,' and their adherents are highly electrified at the possibility of a 'leftist coup' (s*ee section below on Mass Mobilization of Decentralized, Armed Individuals*).

(2) Mass mobilization of decentralized, armed individuals

If demonstrations involve the mass mobilization of decentralized, yet armed, individuals, then there will be a higher risk of small-scale, individualized violence. This is especially the case if mobilization increasingly takes the form of 'muster calls' or armed 'calls to action.' Cases where armed and primed individuals have responded to networked calls to action have resulted in multiple shooting incidents targeting opposing demonstrators in recent months. Examples include Kyle Rittenhouse's response to a muster call by the Kenosha Guard in Wisconsin in late August (New York Times, 16 October 2020), or Steven Ray Baca's response to a muster call by the New Mexico Civil Guard in Albuquerque, New Mexico in June (The Guardian, 17 June 2020). While such violence has so far been small in scale and scope, it has proven lethal.

While this type of lethal violence has yet to become a feature of the post-election period, the risk of escalation is significant. Since the election, armed individuals have demonstrated the willingness to respond to calls to 'stop the steal'. For example, two armed QAnon supporters were arrested outside a vote-counting center in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania for carrying handguns without a license after driving there from Virginia two days after the election. Some reports indicate that they intended to deliver fraudulent ballots to the center (CNN, 7 November 2020). Their traveling from a distance to 'support the cause' highlights the draw of broad calls to action.

The following day in Detroit, Michigan, police investigated a bomb threat outside of a voting center where absentee ballots were being counted amidst rival pro-Trump and pro-Biden demonstrations (FOX2 Detroit, 6 November 2020). A similar incident was also reported in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania on 6 November (The Independent, 6 November 2020), as well as death threats targeting election officials with reminders that "this is what the Second Amendment is for" (Philly Voice, 9 November 2020).[15] Such incidents underline how calls to action can inspire those not formally affiliated with organized groups.

[15] Violent threats against poll workers and election officials have continued well past the vote in key swing states. According to a PBS investigation in mid-November: "The exact number of incidents of poll-worker intimidation is unknown. But a FRONTLINE review, based on questions to a dozen election and law enforcement agencies in five swing states, as well as local media reports, found examples of threats or acute security risks to election workers in Pennsylvania, Nevada, Michigan, Arizona and Georgia" (PBS, 17 November 2020).

Similarly, in mid-November, a number of people, including some armed with assault rifles and handguns, gathered in Johnson Square in Savannah, Georgia for a 'Stop the Steal' event (Savannah Now, 21 November 2020). Despite no reports suggesting these individuals were part of an organized militia, local or otherwise, the call to 'stop the steal' still served to inspire them to take up arms and 'join the fight.'

In the past, this type of mobilization has typically occurred around 'Second Amendment Rallies,' wherein supporters are asked to show up armed to a demonstration, often on the steps of a capitol building or in direct response to policy, proposed or otherwise. For example, this year, a series of pro-Second Amendment, pro-militia, and anti-lockdown protests have been reported in and around Lansing, Michigan. These began in the early days of the coronavirus pandemic, in response to public health restrictions, and have continued through the election period. These types of mobilizations provide an important on-ramp for recently radicalized individuals, or those who have become prone to commit violence without the social accountability of a more organized group, even if such accountability structures are typically weak. Many actors in this space also consider local law enforcement as at least tacit allies in their efforts to 'quell riots' or 'protect property.' These actors range from militia groups like the Oath Keepers, who showed up in Louisville, Kentucky to 'assist' police and 'guard' gas stations around protests over the Breonna Taylor[16] case, to more local groups like the gathering of armed vigilantes in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho ahead of fears of a rumored 'Antifa' action.

Importantly, this trajectory focuses on networked 'calls to action,' though is in line with a more decentralized response system. Muster calls, lobby days, declarations of restitution, and other calls to action tend to precede these events. This serves to make such incidents more predictable for policymakers and local law enforcement. In this way, it is distinct from the trajectory described below (Increasing Attacks by Violent Sole Perpetrators). The latter is more sporadic and less predictable, making its likelihood in both the short- and medium-term — as well as its potential for violence — higher.

(3) Increasing attacks by violent sole perpetrators

If demonstrations increasingly come under attack by violent sole perpetrators, there will be a higher risk of widespread individualized violence and disorder. This type of incident — including car rammings, individual assaults, or 'leaderless resistance' modalities — have become more common since May, and especially in support of President Trump around the election.

Car-ramming attacks have become increasingly common in the US, especially relative to other countries (NPR, 21 June 2020) — a trend that is at particularly high risk of intensifying given encouragement online (e.g. "All Lives Splatter" memes) (Bloomberg, 3 June 2020) and the major emphasis on 'Trump train' and caravan/convoy demonstrations in recent right-wing mobilization. In these types of demonstrations, supporters, usually in pick-up trucks, drive into and through towns, often making threats from their vehicles or online, and sometimes even intentionally ramming counter-protesters. Those engaging in these demonstrations are also often armed, which heightens the risk of violence (Vanity Fair, 7 December 2020; Washington Post, 1 November 2020). For example, two days before the election, a pro-Trump car caravan rally was held in Richmond, Virginia, with counter-protesters also present nearby (Richmond Times-Dispatch, 2 November 2020). While no injuries were reported, violence ensued. Some pro-Trump supporters sprayed chemical irritants at the counter-protesters. Witnesses report shots being fired, with at least one pro-Trump supporter allegedly firing a gun at a counter-protester. Another counter-protester stated that he narrowly avoided being run over by one of the vehicles participating in the caravan.

[16] Police killed Breonna Taylor, a 26-year-old Black woman and paramedic, in Louisville, Kentucky last March during a botched raid on her apartment (New York Times, 1 September 2020). The lawsuit filed by Taylor's family alleges that police raided the "wrong house," and the targeted suspect had already been located elsewhere, while authorities have maintained that their warrant allowed them to search the premises as well and claim the raid in question was intentional (AP, 7 July 2020). The search warrant application is currently under investigation by the FBI.

While car rammings have not been a tactic used exclusively by the right-wing — for example, in late July, several demonstrators taking part in a 'Defend the Police' rally, organized by the Northern Colorado Young Republicans, were hit by an SUV in Eaton, Colorado (Greeley Tribune, 25 July 2020) — they have disproportionately targeted the left.

'MAGA Drag' events, as they are often termed around and beyond the election, have resulted in several high-profile events, aside from individual car-ramming attacks. For example, the week before the election, a group of drivers supporting President Trump surrounded a Biden/Harris campaign bus on a stretch of highway outside of Austin, Texas. Pro-Trump supporters, many of whom were armed, surrounded the bus on the interstate and attempted to drive it off the road (CNN, 1 November 2020). One of the drivers hit a Biden campaign staffer's car. The event, which caused the Biden campaign to cancel an event in nearby Pflugerville due to safety concerns (Texas Tribune, 31 October 2020), was "celebrated" by President Trump, who tweeted his support for those who had swarmed the bus (NPR, 1 November 2020). Since the vote, in mid-November, during a protest against the president while he was golfing at Trump National Golf Club in Sterling, Virginia, a pro-Trump counter-protester forcefully exhaled on two women demonstrators after they commented that he was not wearing a face mask during the pandemic. The Trump supporter was later charged with misdemeanor assault amid coronavirus concerns (Politico, 23 November 2020).

Individualized violence and intimidation is also common outside of these contexts, in the form of hate crimes. In recent weeks, ACLED has recorded multiple cases of property destruction targeting specific ethnic, religious, and political groups. In Alabama, unidentified assailants perpetrated an arson attack against a business owned by the leader of the local BLM chapter (WBRC, 12 November 2020), though there were no reports of anyone hurt in the incident. In Texas, the mailbox of a pro-Biden couple was spray-painted with swastikas weeks after all of their Biden-Harris signs were destroyed (KLTV, 16 November 2020). Likewise, a swastika painted on a newspaper was left outside the office of a left-leaning news outlet in Kentucky. Furthermore, the Jewish Center at the University of Kentucky was vandalized after the Rabbi claimed to have received death threats. In November, the FBI reported that hate crimes in the US rose to their highest levels in over a decade last year (AP, 16 November 2020).

Importantly, this trajectory focuses on how individual actors, outside of more 'firm networks,' may use gatherings to commit violence or to intimidate political rivals. Such gatherings can serve as a platform or area of operations for individuals prepared to commit violence or disorder to follow through on their ideation, often as people are leaving marches or after protests disintegrate. In this way, this trajectory is distinct from the one described above (Mass Mobilization of Decentralized, Armed Individuals). It is more sporadic and unpredictable, making its likelihood in both the short- and medium-term, as well as its potential for violence, higher than the former, which relies on networked 'calls to action' through a more decentralized response system.

(4) Unarmed mass mobilization

If demonstrations represent mass mobilization of unarmed, non-militia — or otherwise broadly unaffiliated — and heterogenous right-wing individuals, then there will be a lower risk of lethal violence, and yet a higher risk of street-fighting, especially brawls with counter-protesters. Right-wing demonstrations are highly competitive, and counter-protests disproportionately involve right-wing supporters. Approximately 19% of all demonstrations in the US since the election have been right-wing, but right-wing activists have participated in more than 80% of all counter-protests during the same period (see graph below).[17]

[17] It is important to remember that not all demonstrations can be categorized as right- or left-wing (i.e. the fact that less than 19% of demonstrations since the election have been right-wing does not mean that over 81% have been left-wing). For example, a large proportion of demonstrations in recent weeks have been related to the coronavirus pandemic (for more, see this recent infographic from ACLED's COVID-19 Disorder Tracker). While some of these can be categorized as right-wing (e.g. those involving armed right-wing groups challenging the state's authority to mandate mask-wearing) or as left-wing (e.g. those admonishing the Trump administration's handling of the pandemic), others cannot be easily categorized as such. For example, a protest involving restaurant staff advocating against coronavirus restrictions so that they can get back to work is not necessarily 'right-wing,' and a protest involving healthcare workers advocating for more access to personal protective equipment (PPE) to keep them safe is not necessarily 'left-wing.' Many of these types of demonstrations do not cite involvement by a right- or left-wing group, and sources do not report protesters making right- or left-wing claims. As such, the specific political stance of such protests cannot be definitively known — and is hence not grouped into right-wing or left-wing categories for this analysis.

Pro-Trump demonstrations have drawn numerous protesters, many of whom may not have previously taken to the streets over the summer. These individuals have been consuming a very particular strain of fringe media that has shaped the way they will respond, particularly around the acceptance of election results. Whether these sources be QAnon, anti-mask, or election fraud information streams, disinformation articles are often shared on friendly social media sites, like Parler, or on militia forums, such as MyMilitia (Conversation, 27 November 2020). There is also substantial spread of violent memes and content around attacking left- or BLM-associated protesters that have, in some instances, been tied directly to violence (Wall Street Journal, 25 October 2020).

In addition to a space to protest, these demonstrations also provide networking and recruitment opportunities. A collection of right-wing ideologies have been present at these demonstrations: a coalition of convenience and common purpose. It includes the likes of InfoWars, a right-wing conspiracy news site headed by Alex Jones, who has a history of involvement in street rallies; to the Groyper Army, Nick Fuentes' most recent evolution of the America First traditionalist, neo-fascist movement; to viewers of One America News Network (OANN), a far-right media outfit friendly to Trump and pro-Trump writers; to QAnon, the conspiracy theory originating from 4Chan users, detailing Trump's fight against the 'deep state' that opposes Trump and connects to theories that powerful Democrats run a secret pedophilia ring for the world's elite; to Proud Boys and other armed groups; and beyond.

These groups have already come together at protests since the election. On 14 November, thousands of Trump supporters made the trek to Washington, DC to participate in a large 'Stop the Steal' event called the 'Million MAGA March.' Attendees included hundreds of unarmed, unaffiliated protesters as well as groups like the Proud Boys, the Oath Keepers, Boogaloo Bois, the III%ers, QAnon, and the American Guard, among others, who were in turn met by counter-protesters, including BLM supporters and antifascists, among others (BuzzFeed, 15 November 2020). While the march during the day was largely peaceful, rioting and fighting between the right and left was reported both before and after the march, including fist fights; use of clubs and projectiles; setting off fireworks; spraying of irritants; multiple stabbings; and a car-ramming attack (Washington Post, 15 November 2020). Days later, a multi-day protest was held in Atlanta, Georgia, attracting hundreds of people. Right-wing influencers like Alex Jones of InfoWars, Nick Fuentes of Groypers, and Enrique Tarrio of the Proud Boys, among others, were in attendance. Demonstrators marched into the state capitol as part of a 'Stop the Steal' event amid Georgia's high-profile recount (Daily Mail, 18 November 2020). Several participants held 'We are Q' signs, in support of QAnon, and 'thin blue line' flags, expressing support for law enforcement. The group was met by a small group of counter-protesters, including BLM and Antifa supporters, among others (11Alive, 21 November 2020).

Such networking and recruitment across group identities has the potential for further ideological escalation into the future. Given the local nature of these protests, local politics also serve to impact the political inclinations of the demonstrators, in turn creating space for coalition building and cross-pollination among the participating movements. The 'Stop the Steal' mobilizations have moved from grassroots-organized protests in places like Arizona towards more centrally organized and nationally orchestrated mobilizations with a dedicated political action committee, such as the 'Million MAGA March'. With this national attention, a broader coalition of right-wing actors and ideologies have been mobilized and engaged in demonstrations, from militia groups and white nationalists to conspiracy theorists and internet trolls.

Conclusion

Pro-Trump and right-wing organizing has changed significantly since the election, and analysis of ACLED data indicates that it will likely continue to evolve going into the inauguration and initial stages of the Biden administration. Demonstrations have increasingly involved organized, armed militia groups. They have also involved armed, decentralized, and potentially violent individuals, especially those who may respond to 'muster calls' or travel from a distance to take action. And they have involved unarmed mass mobilization as well — all while sporadic attacks by sole perpetrators have become more common.

Right-wing groups and militias are already planning events on and around Inauguration Day, shifting in recent weeks from viewing the 'Stop the Steal' movement as the ultimate form of mobilization towards contesting the election with the assumption that the result cannot be changed before Biden takes office. The emergence of new groups and organizing parties indicates that militias and armed groups are not going away after the end of the election period. Given the resurgence of the modern militia movement in 2009, following the election and inauguration of former President Barack Obama, similar patterns are already beginning to replicate themselves — from militia recruitment to Tea Party-style political organizing.

Even as key trends in activity have changed, many of the same political strains that have impacted social movements, mobilization, and violence over the summer have persisted through the election and will continue into the near future. This includes the coronavirus crisis, which has worsened during the election and post-election period. Spikes in COVID-19 deaths have been highly correlated with demonstrations linked to the pandemic (for more, see this recent infographic from ACLED's COVID-19 Disorder Tracker) — both those demanding a stronger government response to curb the pandemic, as well as those opposed to public health restrictions. With cases and deaths surging (Washington Post, 7 December 2020), officials are likely to take further steps to slow the spread of the virus, such as the renewed stay-at-home order put in place in California (The Guardian, 7 December 2020). In December, President-elect Biden stated that he will ask Americans to wear face masks for the first 100 days after he takes office (CNN, 3 December 2020). A more forceful government response to the pandemic, especially at the national level, could lead to a major increase in counter-mobilizing on the right.

The future of right-wing mobilization will also be impacted by changes in gun regulation. Many on the armed right are extremely worried about President-elect Biden or other newly elected Democrats implementing gun restrictions (CNN, 12 November 2020). Concerns are primarily focused on potential AR-15 or high-capacity magazine bans, both of which would likely drive major armed right-wing mobilization to state capitols and Washington, DC (CBS News, 12 November 2020; Vox, 20 August 2020). The risk of armed unrest around the gun regulation debate is likely to grow, as increasingly militant pro-Second Amendment organizations have continued to thrive throughout 2020 (Mother Jones, 2 December 2020).

Lastly, core drivers of left-wing mobilization — which is also a major motivator of reactive right-wing counter-mobilization — largely remain in place. From unmet promises for social and racial justice, to COVID-19's massive economic impact, especially on marginalized communities, to persistent inequities in the healthcare system, the US has failed to meet many of the needs identified by these movements. The intersection of future spikes in left-wing protest activity and the right-wing mobilization patterns outlined above could constitute significant flashpoints for violence and unrest.

President Trump's continued refusal to concede, support for disinformation campaigns aimed at delegitimizing the incoming administration, and reported preliminary planning to launch a 2024 bid to retake the White House on Inauguration Day (NBC News, 1 December 2020) — in addition to the potential for stronger public health restrictions, new gun regulations, and resurgent left-wing activism under President Biden — are among the range of drivers that could activate and shape the trajectories identified in this report. Monitoring these risk factors will be critical for efforts to prevent peaceful mobilization from devolving into political violence, and mitigating the threat of violent instability through the inauguration and beyond.

U.S. Prosecutors Expect to Charge Hundreds of Capitol Rioters (/dr20210113-u-s-prosecutors-expect-to-charge-hundreds-of-capitol-rioters)

By Masood Farivar

U.S. prosecutors say they have identified more than 170 people for potential criminal charges in connection with the January 6 storming of the U.S. Capitol and that they expect that number to run into the hundreds in the coming weeks as a massive nationwide hunt for the pro-Trump rioters continues.

Is Impeaching President Trump "Pointless Revenge"? Not If It Sends a Message to Future Presidents (/dr20210113-is-impeaching-president-trump-pointless-revenge-not-if-it-sends-a-message-to-future-presidents)

By Michael Blake

If Congress chooses to impeach President Trump, it is because there is a need to mark out, through a definitive statement, what no president ought to do. It will also set the moral limits of the presidency – and, thereby, send a message to future presidents who might be tempted to follow in President Trump's footsteps.

Vaccines

As the Vaccines Arrive, So Do the Questions (/dr20210113-as-the-vaccines-arrive-so-do-the-questions)

By Robin Rauzi

As the first COVID-19 vaccines are being administered across the United States—developed, tested, and approved with historic speed—countless questions have arisen about what comes next. Is one vaccine better than another? Can the United States both speed up inoculation and overcome some people's hesitance to get the shot?

An Avalanche of Violence: Revealing Predictable Patterns in Armed Conflicts (/dr20210113-an-avalanche-of-violence-revealing-predictable-patterns-in-armed-conflicts)

It's Getting Hot in Here: Warming World Will Fry Power Plant Production (/dr20210113-its-getting-hot-in-here-warming-world-will-fry-power-plant-production)

There's no doubt the Earth's temperatures are going up. The power plants that keep air conditioners pushing out cold air could soon be in a vicious cycle in a warming world–not able to keep up with growing demands on hotter days and driving up greenhouse gas emissions to dangerous levels.

Water security

Finding Toxic Chemicals in Drinking Water (/dr20210113-finding-toxic-chemicals-in-drinking-water)

Most consumers of drinking water in the United States know that chemicals are used in the treatment processes to ensure the water is safe to drink. But they might not know that the use of some of these chemicals, such as chlorine, can also lead to the formation of unregulated toxic byproducts.

Food security

Beating the "Billion-Dollar Bug" Is a Shared Burden (/dr20210113-beating-the-billiondollar-bug-is-a-shared-burden)

A lurking threat that has stymied US corn growers for decades is now returning to the forefront: western corn rootworm. Sometimes referred to as the "billion-dollar bug," the species' tiny larvae chew through the roots of corn plants, causing devastating yield losses. In 2003, farmers began planting a genetically engineered variety of corn known as "Bt," which produces a protein toxic to the pest species – but by 2009, the billion-dollar bug had already evolved adaptations for resistance to the toxin. Study shows how individual farming practices associated with greater corn rootworm damage can have farther-reaching effects.

The FBI is warning state and local and law enforcement around the country of plans for violent action by right-wing extremists in the day leading up to the inauguration of Joe Biden on 20 January. According to the FBI, various right-wing extremist groups are planning a series of protests in the capitals of all fifty states between 16 and 20 January, and in Washington, D.C. between the 17 and 20 of January.

U.S. Capitol Mob Highlights 5 Reasons Not to Underestimate Far-Right Extremists (/dr20210112-u-s-capitol-mob-highlights-5-reasons-not-to-underestimate-farright-extremists)

By Alexander Hinton

In the wake of the mob incursion that took over the U.S. Capitol on Jan. 6, it's clear that many people are concerned about violence from far-right extremists. But they may not understand the real threat. While researching my forthcoming book, It Can Happen Here: White Power and the Rising Threat of Genocide in the U.S., I discovered that there are five key mistakes people make when thinking about far-right extremists. These mistakes obscure the extremists' true danger.

The Russia connection

U.S. Hits Back at Russian Election Disinformation Ring (/dr20210112-u-s-hits-back-at-russian-election-disinformation-ring)

By Jeff Seldin

The United States is taking steps to punish members of a Russian-backed influence operation that sought to interfere with November's election and damage the campaign of President-elect Joe Biden. The Treasury Department on Monday announced sanctions against seven people and four companies, all connected to Ukrainian politician Andrii Derkach, previously identified by U.S. officials as a long-time Russian agent. Derkach fed Rudi Giuliani, Donald Trump's personal lawyer, Russia-fabricated derogatory misinformation on Joe Biden, and Giuliani's role in the plot was to disseminate it on pro-Trump news outlets like One America Network.

Truth decay

Stopping the Deluge of Disinformation Flooding the Internet, Social Media (/dr20210112-stopping-the-deluge-of-disinformation-flooding-the-internet-social-media)

The use and spread of disinformation — false or misleading information intended to deceive people — is being amplified and accelerated at an alarming rate on the internet via social media. Within the U.S., this has quickly eroded trust in institutions that serve as the bedrocks of our society, such as science, the media, and government, to the point that we can't even agree on basic facts.

Want Cheaper Nuclear Energy? Turn the Design Process into a Game (/dr20210112-want-cheaper-nuclear-energy-turn-the-design-process-into-a-game)

By Kim Martineau

Nuclear energy provides more carbon-free electricity in the United States than solar and wind combined, making it a key player in the fight against climate change. But the U.S. nuclear fleet is aging, and operators are under pressure to streamline their operations to compete with coal- and gas-fired plants. Researchers show that deep reinforcement learning can be used to design more efficient nuclear reactors.

U.S. Capitol Police Overrun by Mob After Declining Help (/dr20210108-u-s-capitol-police-overrun-by-mob-after-declining-help)

By Jeff Seldin

Law enforcement officials in charge of protecting the U.S. Capitol repeatedly declined offers of additional assistance ahead of Wednesday's protest-turned-riot that forced lawmakers to take shelter, delaying certification of the results of the country's presidential election. The allegations, from defense and military officials, come a day after large crowds of extremists supporting President Donald Trump pushed past barricades and members of the Capitol Police to rampage through the building.

The Uncomfortable Questions Facing Capitol Police over the Security Breach by MAGA Mob

By Tom Nolan

When die-hard Trump supporters are able to storm the U.S. Capitol and forcefully occupy offices in the House and the Senate, questions over security are going to be asked. Something clearly didn't go to plan on Wednesday. The man in charge of policing that day, U.S. Capitol Police Chief Steven Sund, has since announced he is resigning. But even with him gone, what will remain are serious questions that will need to be answered about how an angry mob was able to circumvent security and enter the Capitol building.

PERSPECTIVE: Capitol security failure

How can the U.S. Capitol, surrounded by one of the largest concentrations of law enforcement and national security personnel in the world, be so quickly overrun by Trump insurrectionists hell-bent on "stopping the steal," halting our cherished democratic processes, and potentially harming lawmakers? Mark Nevitt writes that "it was always drilled home from my time in the military the importance of unity of command and unity of effort.... But prior to the insurrection, Trump himself incited it, in tweets and in a speech that morning. Shockingly, the person at the very top of the chain of command was not interested in protecting the Capitol nor the lawmakers inside during a time of national crisis."

Extremism

Extremists React to Pro-Trump Siege on Capitol

(/dr20210108-extremists-react-to-protrump-siege-on-capitol)

On Wednesday, January 6, 2021, pro-Trump extremists, including some identified right-wing extremists, stormed the U.S. Capitol building, interrupting the Congressional session affirming the election results and forcing a partial evacuation. In chatrooms and other extremist forums, many people cheered the actions of those at the Capitol, praising the trespassers as patriots who were willing to "stand up" to politicians and the government. many users shared their belief that war is coming, and some encouraged people to be prepared for further action.

Extremism

Capitol Hill Riots Prompt Germany to Revisit Online Hate Speech Law (/dr20210108-capitol-hill-riots-prompt-germany-to-revisit-online-hate-speech-law)

Numerous social networks were quick to impose bans President Donald Trump, preventing him from continuing to disseminate lies on their platforms, and, more importantly, blocking him from using his social media accounts to incite violence. For many critics, these restrictions came four years too late. The assault on the U.S. Capitol by Trump supporters has led to fresh calls in Germany for more restrictions on extremist speech in Germany, too.

DHS

The Role of Congressional Oversight in Department Reform (/dr20210108-the-role-of-congressional-oversight-in-department-reform)

By Julia Siegel

The Scowcroft Center's Forward Defense project and the Center for a New American Security (CNAS) hosted a panel of former Department of Homeland Security (DHS) officials to discuss why now is the time to streamline congressional oversight of DHS. The goal of the Forward Defense project is to craft sustainable, nonpartisan strategies that meet the complex security challenges of today and tomorrow, and the panel explored how fragmented congressional oversight impacts DHS and charted a path forward.

- FBI Washington Field Office Assistant Director in Charge Steven M. D'Antuono delivered the following remarks during a [Jan. 12] press briefing at the Department of Justice regarding the January 6, 2021, violent activity at the U.S. Capitol. See press release for details.
- From Breitbart News: FBI WFO AD Steven D'Antuono said that, as part of its investigation into who attacked the U.S. Capitol on January 6, the FBI is "actively looking at" the guilty parties being put on a "No-Fly-List" for domestic travel in the U.S. FBI 'Actively Looking' At Putting Capitol Attackers On 'No-Fly-List'

2. U.S. Pursuing Seditious Conspiracy Cases In 'Unprecedented' Probe Of Capitol Assault [Reuters] WFO

- The United States has opened criminal investigations of more than 170 people who stormed the Capitol last week and plans to charge some of the most serious offenders with assault and seditious conspiracy for their role in the violence.
- Acting Washington, D.C., U.S. Attorney Michael Sherwin expects hundreds of people ultimately to be charged as the FBI reviews more than 100,000 photos and videos of the unrest.
- From Daily Mail – UK: The FBI has released two photos of a suspect they want to question about the murder of US Capitol Police officer Brian Sicknick during last week's violent riots.

3. FBI Has Opened Over 160 Cases Tied To Pro-Trump Capitol Riot [Wall Street Journal] WFO

- Army Secretary Ryan McCarthy has decided to allow National Guard members being sent to Washington through next week's presidential inauguration to carry weapons.
- The Joint Chiefs of Staff and the heads of the branches of the U.S. military called the Jan. 6 assault, in which a violent, pro-Trump mob forcibly entered the Capitol where lawmakers were certifying Mr. Biden's presidential victory, "a direct assault on the U.S. Congress, the Capitol building, and our constitutional process."
- From AP: Amid worry about renewed violence on Inauguration Day, the military's top leaders issued a written reminder to all service members Tuesday [Jan. 12] that the deadly insurrection at the Capitol last week was an anti-democratic, criminal act, and that the right to free speech gives no one the right to commit violence. Top Military Leaders Remind Troops Of Limits Of Free Speech

4. FBI Report Warned Of 'War' At Capitol, Contradicting Claims That There Was No Indication Of Looming Violence [Minneapolis Star Tribune via Washington Post] WFO

- A day before rioters stormed Congress, an FBI office in Virginia issued an explicit internal warning that extremists were preparing to travel to Washington to commit violence and "war."
- A situational information report approved for release the day before the [Jan. 6] U.S. Capitol riot painted a dire portrait of dangerous plans, including individuals sharing a map of the complex's tunnels, and possible rally points for would-be conspirators to meet up in Kentucky, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and South Carolina and head in groups to Washington.

- "As of 5 January 2021, FBI Norfolk received information indicating calls for violence in response to 'unlawful lockdowns' to begin on 6 January 2021 in Washington. D.C.." "An online thread discussed specific calls for violence to include stating 'Be ready to fight. Congress needs to hear glass breaking, doors being kicked in, and blood from their BLM and Pantifa slave soldiers being spilled. Get violent. Stop calling this a march, or rally, or a protest. Go there ready for war. We get our President or we die. NOTHING else will achieve this goal."
- From AP: Steven D'Antuono, the FBI WFO Assistant Director, said that once he received the Jan. 5 warning, the information was quickly shared with other law enforcement agencies through the joint terrorism task force. FBI Says It Warned About Prospect Of Violence Ahead Of Riot

5. In Part Due To Free Speech Worries, FBI Never Issued Intel Bulletin About Possible Capitol Violence [NBC] WFO

- Analysts in the FBI's Intelligence Division gathered information about possible violence involving the Capitol on Jan. 6., but the FBI never distributed a formal intelligence bulletin, in part because of concerns that doing so might have run afoul of free speech protections, one current and two former senior FBI officials familiar with the matter told NBC News.
- While the FBI did share some threat intelligence with law enforcement, the lack of a comprehensive Joint Intelligence Bulletin compiled by the FBI's Intelligence Branch — which would have made assessments about possible threats and have been shared with relevant law enforcement agencies — left the Capitol Police and other agencies lacking the full picture of what the FBI had learned from human sources and social media postings about what extremists were saying about plans to assault the Capitol.
- The former officials said the reluctance to distribute such a document highlighted a longstanding FBI dilemma under which the bureau has been reticent about circulating intelligence related to far right or far left domestic terrorism, while regularly issuing bulletins about threats from violent Americans who have adopted the ideology of Al Qaeda or ISIS.

6. House Democrats Briefed On 3 Terrifying Plots To Overthrow Government [Huffington Post] WFO

- The first is a demonstration billed as the "largest armed protest ever to take place on American soil."
- Another is a protest in honor of Ashli Babbitt, the woman killed while trying to climb into the Speaker's Lobby during Wednesday's pro-Trump siege of the Capitol.
- And another demonstration, which three members said was by far the most concerning plot, would involve insurrectionists forming a perimeter around the Capitol, the White House and the Supreme Court, and then blocking Democrats from entering the Capitol — perhaps even killing them — so that Republicans could take control of the government.

- The suspect, Eduard Florea, was arrested by the FBI on a weapons-related charge. Florea, who was believed to be responsible for the online threats, did not appear to have been at the Capitol during the violent protests. Some of the postings allegedly talked about organizing an armed caravan to head to Washington D.C. following the protests that resulted in the deaths of five people.
- From WABC/ABC7 – New York, NY: Flores is the third person arrested Tuesday [Jan. 12] by FBI-NY in connection with the investigation into the Capitol riot. 1. Xinjiang's System of Militarized Vocational Training Comes to Tibet < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=f08e33942a&e=ebf6228344 >

In 2019 and 2020, the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) introduced new policies to promote the systematic, centralized, and large-scale training and transfer of "rural surplus laborers" to other parts of the TAR, as well as to other provinces of the People's Republic of China (PRC). In the first 7 months of 2020, the region had trained over half a million rural surplus laborers through this policy. This scheme encompasses Tibetans of all ages, covers the entire region, and is distinct from the coercive vocational training of secondary students and young adults reported by exile Tibetans (RFA < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=69bd5a4796&e=ebf6228344 > , October 29, 2019).

The labor transfer policy mandates that pastoralists and farmers are to be subjected to centralized "military-style" (军旅式, junlüshi) vocational training, which aims to reform "backward thinking" and includes training in "work discipline," law, and the Chinese language. Examples from the TAR's Chamdo region indicate that the militarized training regimen is supervised by People's Armed Police drill sergeants, and training photos published by state media show Tibetan trainees dressed in military fatigues.

In recent years, the People's Republic of China (PRC) has emerged as a leading producer of unmanned aerial vehicle (UAV) platforms for both commercial and military use, and its technologies are being used in unprecedented ways. For example, as the COVID-19 pandemic began to unfold in the early months of this year (China Brief < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=c68e3476c3&e=ebf6228344 > , January 17; China Brief < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=bfaba4d4bc&e=ebf6228344 > , January 29), UAVs started to appear in the skies across China. Public officials employed these UAVs to monitor the population, and to enforce restrictions (such as mandatory wearing of masks) intended to slow the spread of COVID-19 (Global Times < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=fc62ef4536&e=ebf6228344 > , January 31). UAVs have also been used to monitor water levels and property damage amid the severe flooding that China has experienced this summer (China Brief < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=087e85df11&e=ebf6228344 > , July 29; CGTN < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=7e034ed3d6&e=ebf6228344 > , August 15). Such innovative—if sometimes controversial—practices reflect China's growing capabilities in the field of UAV technology.

Since January, much of the international news coverage surrounding the People's Republic of China (PRC) has been dominated by the story of the COVID-19 outbreak—a previously unknown coronavirus that first manifested in the central Chinese city of Wuhan in early December, and which has since rapidly proliferated throughout China and many other countries throughout the world (China Brief < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=a690a63140&e=ebf6228344 > , January 29; Johns-Hopkins University, ongoing < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=f29b7cb9c8&e=ebf6228344 >). The COVID-19 pandemic has largely crowded out international attention to another viral outbreak that Chinese authorities and farmers have been battling for eighteen months: African Swine Fever (非洲猪瘟, Feizhou Zhuwen), which throughout 2018 and 2019 devastated pig populations in both the PRC and primary staple meat in Chinese society. As such, it has had a significant impact on the Chinese economy, and has also given senior officials of the ruling Chinese Communist Party (CCP) reason to fear the potential impacts on "social stability" (社会稳定, shehui wending)—the CCP's perennial overriding domestic concern.

Over the years, unremitting hostility between the United States and the Islamic Republic of Iran has created opportunities as well as dilemmas for the People's Republic of China (PRC). The Trump administration's unilateral withdrawal from the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA) in May 2018, and the subsequent adoption of a "maximum pressure" campaign against Iran, presented mixed challenges and opportunities for the PRC. Beijing has sought to exploit the rift between Washington and Tehran without further fueling Sino-American tensions.

For the past year, Washington and Tehran have been locked in an action-reaction cycle of escalation. This dangerous spiral reached new heights with the January 2 U.S. drone strike that killed Iranian Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps Quds Force commander General Qasem Soleimani, which was followed by retaliatory Iranian missile attacks on two coalition bases in Iraq that injured dozens of American troops. Although both sides managed to pull back from the brink of war in early January, underlying tensions remain—as does the possibility of a more direct military confrontation.

A sweeping crackdown starting in late 2016 transformed Xinjiang into a draconian police state (China Brief < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=9236486176&e=ebf6228344 > , September 21, 2017). While state control over reproduction has long been a common part of the birth control regime in the People's Republic of China (PRC), the situation in Xinjiang has become especially severe following a policy of mass internment initiated in early 2017 (China Brief < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=08eb8cc8bc&e=ebf6228344 > , May 15, 2018) by officials of the ruling Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

In 2019, a growing number of witnesses testified to the fact that Xinjiang authorities were administering unknown drugs and injections to women in detention, forcibly implanting intrauterine contraceptive devices (IUDs) prior to internment, coercing women to accept surgical sterilization, and using internment as punishment for birth control violations (Washington Post < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=02539b7517&e=ebf6228344 > , November 17, 2019; Associated Press < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=145ee30c70&e=ebf6228344 > , November 26, 2018: Washington Post < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=247ee39fb3&e=ebf6228344 > , October 5, 2019). Over the past two years, a series of government and think tank reports have shed light on the united front, the collection of organizations the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) leverages to co-opt non-Party institutions and influence minority groups at home and overseas (USCC < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=6420f099a6&e=ebf6228344 > , August 2018; ASPI < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=918e612041&e=ebf6228344 > , June 2020). Facing heightened scrutiny, People's Republic of China (PRC) officials have repeatedly insisted that there is "no factual basis" to Western reporting on China's influence operations, and accused foreign analysts of "maliciously hyping up the normal foreign exchanges of the United Front Work Department" (MFA < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=f25ed62e1a&e=ebf6228344 > , June 2020; PRC Embassy in Sweden < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=15f99d96fb&e=ebf6228344 > , August 2019).

However, there is a universal truth known to government bureaucrats in every country: budgets speak louder than words. As this paper demonstrates, the scale and scope of funding for the united front system belie the Chinese government's claims about its importance and function. This article synthesizes information from more than 160 budget and expense reports from national and regional PRC government and Communist Party entities. [1] It finds that organizations central to China's national and regional united front systems spent more than $2.6 billion in 2019, exceeding funding for China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=002913e050&e=ebf6228344 > , 2020). [2] Nearly $600 million (23 percent) was set aside for offices designed to influence foreigners and overseas Chinese communities.

The ill-defined sovereignty of Taiwan, which officially continues to exist under the political identity of the Republic of China (ROC), is often presented as a tension between two possible future outcomes: either unification with the People's Republic of China (PRC), or formal independence. This ambiguous status quo not only allows Taiwan's competing domestic supporters of unification or independence to believe in the possibility that their desired outcome could one day be attained, but has also led PRC officials to believe that widespread latent support for unification endures in Taiwan.

The "2019-nCov" virus epidemic that first appeared in December in the central Chinese city of Wuhan continues to sweep throughout the country: as of February 11, there were over 43,000 official reported cases of persons who had fallen ill from the virus, and over 1,000 reported deaths (Johns-Hopkins CSSE < Caution-https://Jamestown.us11.list-manage.com/track/click?u=28b6673fcc2022a1dd557acae&id=892964aaae&e=ebf6228344 > , February 11). The People's Republic of China (PRC) has sent a polite but blunt message to the incoming administration of U.S. President-elect Joseph R. Biden, urging the resumption of high-level ties while at the same time showing off China's military and economic might. In his belated congratulatory message to President-elect Biden, PRC President Xi Jinping, who is also General Secretary of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) and Chairman of the Central Military Commission (CMC), said that it was in the common interest to "promote [the] healthy and stable development" of bilateral relations. The Continued Threat of Infectious Diseases to the U.S. Military

Friday, January 15, 1200-1300 EST

Join HDIAC Friday, January 15, from 1200 to 1300 EST for a webinar presentation titled "The Continued Threat of Infectious Diseases to the U.S. Military." Please register in advance for the webinar at: Caution-https://www.anymeeting.com/PIID=EF59DA85844938 < Caution-https://www.anymeeting.com/PIID=EF59DA85844938 >

The US military is an expeditionary force and constantly engaged in global missions. During deployment, servicemembers are often at risk from infectious diseases which have the potential to make the individual and the unit mission incapable and cause significant morbidity and mortality. Diseases such as malaria, dengue, diarrheal diseases, and many others threaten the force and require medical countermeasures to eliminate or mitigate the risk.

This webinar builds on Dr. Tim Endy's infectious disease webinar in February of 2020 and the HDIAC Infectious Disease State of the Art Report published in April of 2020; in this latest webinar, Dr. Stephen Thomas will explore the historical beginnings of global infectious disease threats. Dr. Thomas will review the epidemiology, clinical presentation, and current status of therapeutic and preventive measures for common threats. Additionally, U.S. military contributions to countermeasure development will be discussed.

The IDF built barriers along the Lebanon border to deter Hizballah attacks.

The Iranian-backed terror army Hizballah may have its hands full dealing with Lebanon's ongoing economic, health and political crises < Caution-https://www.dw.com/en/lebanon-faces-its-worst-crisis-since-the-civil-war/a-54094075 > , but its secretary-general Hassan Nasrallah still found time < Caution-https://www.timesofisrael.com/hezbollah-says-its-precision-missiles-doubled-in-a-year-can-hit-all-of-israel/ > to threaten revenge against Israel for last July's death of an operative in an alleged Israeli air strike in Syria.

The threats are fueling tension along the Israeli-Lebanese border and contributing to what is an already explosive situation.

A senior Israeli military source warned < Caution-https://www.israelhayom.com/2021/01/01/idf-official-major-flare-up-in-north-could-be-inevitable/ > earlier this month that Hizballah was highly likely to attempt a cross-

Hizballah appears willing to risk an escalation even though it does not wish to initiate an actual war at this time. Rather, it wants to try to impose its "equations" on Israel, meaning an attempt to deter Israel from future strikes against its members in Syria by exacting a calculated price for such incidents.

Yet as the region knows well, and as the Second Lebanon War of 2006 has demonstrated, Hizballah's notions of calculated attacks can quickly backfire and spiral into larger events.

In next-door Syria, the Israel Air Force has spent years running a campaign to destroy sites built by Iran – sometimes in conjunction with its proxy, Hizballah and its ally, the Assad regime – for the assembly of precision missiles, their storage, and placement into launchers to target Israel. Alternatively, the missiles are sometimes smuggled into Lebanon for Hizballah's own arms depots.

Israel has drawn a red line banning the proliferation of precision missiles in Syria and Lebanon. The joint presence of Hizballah and Iranian Quds Force personnel, often found on the same Syrian military sites, means that Hizballah's operatives are at risk of Israel's preventative air strikes in Syria. In recent weeks, the Israeli campaign has reportedly moved into a higher gear < Caution-https://www.haaretz.com/israel-news/.premium.HIGHLIGHT-sensing-iranian-caution-israel-ramps-up-air-strikes-in-syria-1.9437652 > . According to international media reports, there have been three recent Israeli strikes on Iranian-linked targets in Syria, including a strike < Caution-https://www.voanews.com/middle-east/israeli-strikes-syria-kill-6-monitor-says > that reportedly killed six pro-Iranian fighters.

Despite Nasrallah's threats, which the Israeli military takes seriously, senior IDF commanders have indicated that they have no intention of scaling back the preventative campaign in Syria to disrupt Iran's effort to carve out a foothold in the region – even if that entails the possibility of additional Hizballah casualties.

"We have no interest in escalating, we do have an interest in continuing to act to foil the Iranian consolidation program in Syria and the precision missile program in Syria and Lebanon," the IDF Deputy Chief of General Staff, Maj. Gen. Eyal Zamir, told < Caution-https://www.ynet.co.il/news/article/r1WoROcSD > the Ynet news website in September.

"If tomorrow we have to act in Syria against strategic weapons and a Hizballah member will be present there – that won't prevent us from acting. Hence, I suggest that Nasrallah distance his people from Iranian infrastructure in Syria, and carefully consider his actions. We will not allow Hizballah to drag us into lengthy periods of tension. This is not a game that can continue for a long time."

In a sign of ongoing tensions, IDF units stationed on the Lebanese border in the past week have repeatedly < Caution-https://www.jpost.com/breaking-news/suspects-approach-lebanese-border-escape-after-idf-fires-warning-shots-654837 > fired warning shots after suspicious individuals approached the border.

"Learning Competition"

Still, the high tensions haven't stopped the IDF's Northern Command, which is responsible for securing the area, from continuing to study Hizballah, draw lessons from its modus operandi, and upgrade its own battle preparations accordingly.

The "learning competition" between the IDF and Hizballah is a daily affair. The Iranian proxy, whose surface-to-surface firepower dwarfs that of most NATO armies, also continuously studies the IDF, gathering intelligence and drawing up its own future attack plans.

Hizballah's arsenal of projectiles and its well-trained operatives plan to target Israeli civilians while shielding themselves with Lebanese civilians. The IDF's challenge will be to detect and strike Hizballah's targets in order to

A glimpse into this behind-the-scenes learning competition can be found in recent comments by senior IDF commanders, which were made available < Caution-https://www.idf.il/%D7%90%D7%AA%D7%A8%D7%99%D7%9D/%D7%A4%D7%99%D7%A7%D7%95%D7%93-%D7%94%D7%A6%D7%A4%D7%95%D7%9F/2020/%D7%A1%D7%99%D7%9B%D7%95%D7%9D-%D7%A9%D7%A0%D7%AA-2020-%D7%91%D7%92%D7%91%D7%95%D7%9C-%D7%9C%D7%91%D7%A0%D7%95%D7%9F/ > on the Hebrew version of the IDF's official website.

The IDF stated that it had spent last year studying Hizballah intensively. The Northern Command has installed an array of hi-tech cameras and radars along the Lebanese border barrier. Tunnel detection equipment < Caution-https://www.timesofisrael.com/idf-destroys-hezbollah-flagship-attack-tunnel-after-studying-it/ > is in place to discover any new attempts by Hizballah to dig under the Israeli border.

The IDF's 91st Division, in charge of defending the border with Lebanon, would be the first to respond to any escalation, and it has been on high alert for months following Nasrallah's threats.

The division's Deputy Commander, Col. Yair Or, noted that it thoroughly examined an incident that occurred on Sept. 1, 2019, in which Hizballah narrowly missed < Caution-https://www.timesofisrael.com/reports-hezbollah-nearly-missed-manned-armored-car-driving-in-breach-of-orders/ > an IDF jeep after firing two Kornet guided anti-tank missiles at it, drawing many lessons that subsequently shaped battle procedures and preparations.

Hizballah fired those missiles as part of an attempt in "revenge" for the death of two of its operatives < Caution-https://www.timesofisrael.com/idf-identifies-2-killed-in-syria-strike-as-iranian-trained-hezbollah-fighters/ > in airstrikes in Syria in 2019 – marking the first Hizballah vengeance campaign that preceded the current effort. The 2019 attack by Hizballah also followed what it claims was an Israeli drone attack on its precision missile production program in the south Beirut Hizballah stronghold of Dahiya. The IDF fired 100 mortar shells at Hizballah positions in southern Lebanon in response to the missile attack.

Since then, the IDF's Northern Command built up fresh combat techniques and created improvements that served it well in 2020, when Hizballah again went for revenge attacks.

Hizballah has already attempted two attacks < Caution-https://www.timesofisrael.com/israeli-aircraft-strike-hezbollah-observation-posts-after-shots-fired-at-troops/ > since last summer, both of which failed due to IDF preparations.

Since Nasrallah insists on threatening further attacks, the escalation potential remains on the agenda.

In the meantime, Division 91 has built an array of new defensive systems on the border, created new paths for moving its forces and resources around, out of the sight of Hizballah, and setting up new surveillance locations. All of these measures are designed to give the IDF the advantage in the event of a new border escalation.

Israel's Message: Don't Try It

The Israeli-Lebanese border is 130 kilometers long (nearly 81 miles), and the IDF has dug an artificial cliff along parts of it to slow down future cross-border raids by Hizballah's elite Radwan Unit, which has gained combat experience in Syria. That cliff is due to be extended in the coming year.

Division 91, which has been on heightened alert for an extended period since the summer, does not believe that the threat of Hizballah attacks has passed. Its deputy commander, Col. Or, said that the IDF is working to "constantly to reduce the chance of a successful Hizballah retaliation to as low as possible, while continuing to protect northern Israeli civilian communities, and deal with border intrusions."

number of reserve forces. New cooperation procedures with the Air Force, Navy, and the Intelligence Directorate are also in place, to enable faster firepower responses during escalations.

The guiding principle behind the IDF's new battle procedures is that Israel must be the side that "finishes" an incident, while destroying enemy capabilities. That concept informs all of the ways in which the military intends to activate force against Hizballah.

"The directive from our point of view is to respond in order to send a clear message – it is not worthwhile for the enemy to try and harm the IDF and the State of Israel," said Col. Or.

As Division 91 continues to bolster its capabilities, adding things like new surveillance drones and other measures that remain classified, the IDF's intelligence units continue to study Hizballah closely, passing on its information to operational units, even down to the individual combat soldier who takes up a position on the border.

"It's not a secret that with every passing year, Hizballah continues to consolidate – we see it building infrastructure and conducting patrols. Part of our effort is to disrupt and make things harder for Hizballah," said Col. Or.

These recent events all underline the fact that the IDF is in a good position to identify attempted breaches on the border, and is determined to respond forcefully to future Hizballah attacks. It remains far from clear, however, that Nasrallah is prepared to heed the warning and de-escalate.

FEMA Seeks Feedback on NIMS Incident Complexity Guide: Planning, Preparedness and Training

FEMA's National Integration Center is seeking feedback on the 2021 NIMS Incident Complexity Guide: Planning, Preparedness and Training. This national engagement period will conclude at 5 p.m. Eastern Time on February 12, 2021. National engagement provides an opportunity for interested parties to comment on the draft document ensuring that it is relevant for all implementing partners.

The National Incident Management System is a key component of U.S. incident management efforts and enables organizations nationwide to work together during incidents of all kinds and sizes. Implementing NIMS across the nation is a fundamental part of building our national preparedness. FEMA identified the need to construct the 2021 NIMS Incident Complexity Guide to be used for the purpose of planning, preparedness and training, and not as a decision-making tool during a response. This guide assists incident and emergency management personnel in identifying the complexity "level" for an incident or event. Knowledge of the complexity level helps in the management of a disaster, incident, or event that requires deployable mutual aid.

To provide comments on the drafts, complete the feedback form and submit the form to fema-nims@fema.dhs.gov < Caution-mailto:fema-nims@fema.dhs.gov > .

(New York, N.Y.) – The Counter Extremism Project (CEP) reports weekly on the methods used by extremists to exploit the Internet and social media platforms to recruit followers and incite violence. Last week, ISIS released a new propaganda video from their self-proclaimed Sinai province titled "Bleeding Campaigns" depicting attacks with automatic weapons, snipers, and improvised explosive devices against the Egyptian armed forces. Additionally, the pro-ISIS propaganda group War and Media Agency released a video titled "The End and the Beginning" on multiple websites that offered a history of ISIS in Iraq and Syria and condemned anti-ISIS factions in both countries.

Meanwhile, members of extreme right, white supremacist, and neo-Nazi groups and online communities on Telegram and Parler praised the January 6 attack on the U.S. Capitol Building and urged additional violence, including on January 20. Additionally, CEP researchers located 11 white supremacist clothing companies using Instagram to advertise merchandise, including white supremacist or neo-Nazi themed streetwear and Mixed Martial Arts clothing. Finally, CEP researchers located a version of James Mason's book Siege on the print-on-demand website Lulu.

ISIS Releases New Propaganda Video

On Friday, January 8, ISIS released a new propaganda video from its self-proclaimed Sinai province titled "Bleeding Campaigns." The footage shows attacks using automatic weapons, snipers, and improvised explosive devices against the Egyptian armed forces in Sinai. The video also includes footage of the beheading of a man accused of being an Israeli spy and the execution of individuals identified as members of the Egyptian security forces.

The video was uploaded to Telegram, and links were spread via RocketChat. The video was posted to at least nine websites: the Internet Archive, Bcove.video, Mail.Ru, D.Tube, Pcloud, File.Fm, FromSmash.Com, Ok.Ru, and Dropbox. Approximately four hours later, the video was still available on six websites: the Internet Archive, Bcove.Video, D.Tube, File.Fm, FromSmash.Com, and Ok.Ru.

Pro-ISIS Propaganda Group Releases Video

On January 2, the pro-ISIS propaganda group War and Media Agency released a video titled “The End and the Beginning” on multiple websites. The video, over an hour-long, offered a history of ISIS in Iraq and Syria. The video condemned anti-ISIS factions in both countries, and sought to refute the accusations that it has similarities to the early Islamic Kharijite sect.

The propaganda piece also sought to portray the terrorist group as frequently engaging in combat with the Syrian government. The video concluded with previously released footage of pledges of allegiance from different ISIS regional groups and a declaration that the terrorist organization will continue fighting.

The video made extensive use of previously released ISIS propaganda footage, including combat footage, clips taken from execution videos, and the October 2017 ambush of U.S. and Nigerien soldiers in Tongo Tongo. The video also included footage taken from news reports of the November 2020 Vienna attack by Kutjim Fejzulai.

Links for the video were spread on Telegram, RocketChat, and Hoop. The video was uploaded to at least eight websites: the Internet Archive, Bcove.Video, Mail.Ru, pCloud, File.Fm, FromSmash.Com, Ok.Ru, and Dropbox. Approximately 72 hours later, the video was still available on three websites: the Internet Archive, Mail.Ru, and File.Fm.

Extreme-Right, White Supremacists, and Neo-Nazis Praise Storming of U.S. Capitol Building

Members of extreme right, white supremacist, and neo-Nazi groups and online communities praised the January 6 attack on the U.S. Capitol Building. Two official Proud Boys Telegram channels, belonging to the central organization and the group’s British chapter, posted statements and memes supporting the storming of the Capitol and denigrating racial justice movements. The group’s chairman, Enrique Tarrio, shared messages on Parler expressing his support for the attack, including urging those who entered the building to stay, stating that “When the people fear the government, there is tyranny, When the government fears the people, There is liberty.” At least one member of the Proud Boys was arrested by the FBI and is accused of participating in the violent mob that raided the Capitol Building.

A Telegram account belonging to the neo-Nazi group Nationalist Social Club (NSC) shared images of an individual displaying an NSC business card during protests outside of the Capitol. The same account also posted a photo of an alleged U.S. Capitol Police riot helmet with an NSC sticker to claim it as a trophy. It is unknown how the individual in the photo acquired the helmet. A Telegram account affiliated with the white supremacist Rise Above Movement encouraged their audience to attend the demonstrations at the Capitol, stating that it was an “opportunity,” and encouraged attacks against journalists.

Neo-Nazi accelerationist propaganda accounts on Telegram applauded the Capitol's storming and urged additional future violence. One prominent Telegram channel with over 7,500 subscribers expressed hope that the events on January 6 would lead to spiraling violence and urged followers to commit acts to heighten tension and promote disorder. The same channel argued that insurrectionists' ability to storm the Capitol proved that "police authority is a mirage." A notorious neo-Nazi accelerationist Telegram channel with approximately 3,900 members urged terrorist attacks on infrastructure during the month of January and shared a post encouraging violence targeting politicians in their home states on January 20 while the country is preoccupied with the inauguration. The channel has been removed twice by Telegram, most recently in September 2020 after it encouraged attacks on law enforcement officers and Jews, but has returned to the communications app. Another important neo-Nazi accelerationist Telegram channel with over 7,300 subscribers advocated for attacks on police officers. A channel with approximately 1,900 subscribers stated that the events of January 6 were a significant victory for bringing about the collapse of the established order, but that future actions would have to occur in the "battle that is won day by day, hour by hour." A channel that focuses on information and operations security stated that the attack on the Capitol Building would provide the neo-Nazi movement with additional recruits and urged their followers to keep up the momentum, promoting acts of terrorism and offering tips on operations security.

White Supremacist Street Wear Brands Use Instagram to Sell Merchandise

On January 5, CEP researchers located 11 white supremacist clothing companies that use Instagram to advertise merchandise. The accounts belonged to stores located in at least seven countries: the U.S., Serbia, Sweden, Australia, Ukraine, Germany, and the Czech Republic. The majority of the stores sell white supremacist or neo-Nazi themed streetwear and Mixed Martial Arts clothing. All of the Instagram accounts had links to external websites or Telegram accounts.

The Instagram accounts were created between December 2019 and November 2020. Accounts had between 246 and 5,723 followers, with an average of 1,687 followers. The accounts had an average of 73 posts each. All 11 accounts were reported to Instagram on January 8, but were still active 72 hours later.

Executive Summary

The nexus between terrorism and technology is socially and politically more relevant than ever. Almost every mobilisation and radicalisation process and every violent attack, whether carried out or prevented, has an online component to it. Researchers, not least those involved in GNET, are meeting head on the challenge of analysing these processes in difficult empirical online environments. Even when taking into account ever changing platforms and policies, as well as the shift towards ever more closed and encrypted spaces, there is abundant empirical data. This abundance creates challenges and opportunities of its own,[1] yet there are also hard limits to and grey zones around what a researcher dealing with extremist online content can and is allowed to do, which brings in ethical and data protection considerations. Discussions of such topics gained much relevance in recent years and are particularly lively in international research consortia.

While summarising the state of these discussions around ethics and privacy, this GNET report identifies the limits of and opportunities for research and formulates related recommendations for researchers and tech companies. It proceeds in three steps: first, it summarises some of the main ethical considerations that a researcher in this academic field should bear in mind; second, it provides an overview of the main data protection principles that are to be observed and highlights the opportunities for and balancing acts required of researchers in this regard; and third, it discusses the interplay between researchers, data sources and the policies of platforms, condensing in this context some key recommendations for researchers, tech companies and regulators. The most important points are: first, more cross-platform access points and databases would provide incentives for a broader and more vibrant research field; second, badly needed international research collaboration around analysing extremist online content would benefit from greater international harmonisation and a convergence of data protection rules; third, data protection regimes should not be seen as inconveniences but as enabling research by providing a clearer demarcation of what is and is not possible; and, lastly, the dynamic empirical field requires regular mechanisms of exchange between tech companies, researchers and regulators to adapt policies, habits and legal frameworks in a way that does justice to the social and political relevance of the nexus between extremism and technology.

1 Introduction

The digital space played a central role in the radicalisation processes of many perpetrators of past attacks:[1] extremists including Anis Amri (Berlin, Germany), Brenton Tarrant (Christchurch, New Zealand) and Stephan Balliet (Halle, Germany) took advantage of social media platforms not only to gather and distribute information, and to network and stage, but also to exchange ideas with like-minded people and sometimes even to share an attack live for thousands of viewers. It is through this communication by radical or extremist actors that we can learn much about the radicalisation processes that take place in the virtual world. The content and its presentation, as well as the way in which these actors communicate, are of central importance in that regard and can serve as a background against which to develop the most appropriate preventative and demobilising measures.

In the context of this research field, data retrieved from social media naturally has become increasingly important.[2] This is exemplified by numerous scientific publications based on data from social media: for instance, Facebook,[3] Twitter,[4] YouTube[5] and Instagram.[6] An extremely large pool of data can now be accessed and used to develop and test hypotheses.[7] These opportunities go hand in hand with limitations and pitfalls. This relates to potential ethical and data protection requirements, which certainly provide challenges for researchers but also many opportunities. While transparency and the guideline "maximising benefits and minimising harm" are essential throughout the entire research process, there are further principles and guidelines that need to be considered. In the first two sections, we summarise some key ethical considerations that a research process in this academic field should include and we provide insights into the main data protection principles to be observed.[8] We then highlight the opportunities available to and balancing acts required of researchers in this regard. In the third section, we discuss the interplay between researchers, data sources and policies of platforms, and give some key recommendations.

2 Central Ethical Considerations

Ethical considerations play a role in almost every research project. Research ethics thereby "seeks to protect the people involved, not solely ensuring compliance with the legalities".[9] When analysing content from social media platforms, personal data is ubiquitous.[10] While it neither raises completely new ethical issues nor invalidates "recognised norms and values of research ethics",[11] the oftentimes fairly easy access to and the sheer quantity of this kind of data, as well as the speed in which platforms, contexts and events change, make it not only a necessity but also quite a challenge to provide enough space for ethical considerations and adapt such considerations to changing platforms, visualities and policies. Thus, as in any research project, societal and scientific interests need to be balanced against an individual's right to privacy. However, the use of data from social media raises some particular challenges and can "present a potential minefield".[12]

Even though there is no generally accepted guideline that declares that ethical principles must be considered mandatory, some ethical principles have been repeatedly emphasised as particularly relevant in the literature. We can divide these principles into three categories: first, those that concern the relationship between the researcher and individual research subjects. Second, principles concerning the societal dimension. Third and last, those that are self-reflective and concern the researchers themselves. We summarise those findings below with the aim of making them easily accessible for future research on extremism and technology.

Ethical principles that concern the individual research subject

Principles that concern the individual research subject cover confidentiality or respect for persons, and beneficence. Ensuring confidentiality means that researchers who know the identity of a research subject need to take steps to ensure that this identity is not revealed to or by others. Whenever possible, consent should be obtained when using a person's data for research purposes.[13] Informed consent ensures that a person's personal rights and right to informational self-determination are guaranteed. Consequently, researchers are obliged to be transparent and ensure that subjects know that they are being researched, that they are informed about the upcoming research project in a comprehensible format and that they are given the opportunity to agree to participate voluntarily or to decline to do so. However, asking for informed consent is far from an easy task when dealing with extremist content, as seeking to obtain the research subjects' consent may jeopardise the research: knowing that their data will be observed or even analysed often leads people to modify their behaviour. For example, if individuals knew that they (or their online threads, posts and comments) were being observed, they may act differently, communicate through other channels, stop expressing their opinions virtually or adapt them.

Further problems arise when data from many different people is to be used for research purposes.[14] For example, it can hardly be guaranteed that users of 100,000 Twitter accounts, for example, will give their consent in a timely fashion to researchers to use their data. In such cases, researchers may offer an opt-out approach, allowing individuals to withdraw their consent at any time during the research project. The advantage of this approach is that researchers do not have to obtain the consent of all individuals in advance. This option can also be employed if the amount of personal data is relatively small or if the data is anonymised. Researchers should always treat data collected during a study and after its completion confidentially. Whether or not individuals have given their consent to the analysis has no impact. In all cases data should be pseudonymised or made anonymous by researchers. However, anonymisation is often difficult[15] and people can often still be identified after anonymisation.[16] Researchers thus must ask themselves where and how the data is stored, whether the software used is trustworthy, how comprehensive a software vendor's privacy policy is and whether, for example, there is a need for an encryption program.

Furthermore, the principle of beneficence applies: researchers are required to ensure that no harm is done to participants and that the benefits of the study are maximised. For example, in a study on foreign combatants, the researcher must guarantee that all data is made anonymous in such a way that the person cannot be re-identified, as this could possibly result in prosecution or public condemnation. If such anonymisation cannot be guaranteed (for example, due to the constant monitoring of the researcher during meetings with the participant or because the omission of a participant's personal data would make it impossible to test hypotheses), the study may have to be discontinued or redesigned.

As far as maximising the benefits and minimising the risks are concerned, the latter in particular is still a complex undertaking.[17] However, the benefits of data collected online can be maximised with less effort while researching digital topics. Reasons for this include low-threshold possibilities for providing data and codes for reproducibility (for example, Harvard Dataverse or GitHub) or high-quality open-access journals that can reach a large audience (such as the newly founded Global Studies Quarterly by ISA or Texas National Security Review by UT Austin).

Ethical principles that concern the societal dimension

The principles relating to the societal dimension of a research project refer to justice, respect for law and the public interest. The justice principle points to the fact that scientists must ensure a balance of the costs and benefits to different social groups affected by a given research project. Minorities and vulnerable groups must not bear the costs while at the same time majorities and wealthy groups enjoy benefits.[18]

The principle respect for law and the public interest stipulates that laws and site policies relevant to research (for example, of social media companies) must generally be observed.[19] A central problem with digital research is the wide range of responsibilities that have to be observed, such as when collecting data on political extremists in different countries. In very rare cases, however, it is also possible to violate the conditions of use. For instance, New York University made a conscious decision to violate Facebook's terms of use to collect data on Facebook's political advertising strategy, presumably because Facebook continues to refuse to provide researchers with that data.[20] Since political advertising and misinformation in the digital domain are important issues for electoral integrity and the improvement of democracy, and since data should be used exclusively for the common good, the company's terms of use could be violated in this case. Furthermore, in order to satisfy the public interest, researchers must discuss their decisions transparently in public.[21] It is only then that the public is able to hold ethical debates about what scientists do and opinions from such debates can be fed back into research designs, making research projects not only more accountable but also more focused in terms of content. Transparency refers both to disclosing and explaining the research project to research participants and to being open about data collection and processing methods when presenting or publishing research results.

Researchers are obviously part of any research process – their wellbeing should be of concern for any academic as well as for institutional environments. This relates to the safety and/or security of the researcher. In particular, when the topic is as sensitive as that of radicalisation, research must be designed in such a way that researchers themselves are protected. Dangers could entail physical threats and intimidation by others but researcher safety should also include psychological support as well, as there are limits to coping with the potentially harrowing content to be analysed. These aspects need to be taken into account before a project is started, but are all too often forgotten or not fully ensured by the institutions involved in research.

Another issue concerns trust, which operates from the perspective of both the researched and the researchers. For example, researchers must question whether an online profile is a fake. There are limits to what can be verified, as well as to the transparency of one's own identity (safety and security might mean concealing one's identity). Many users employ fictitious names, provide incorrect location information or choose different languages. Often contributions are written in English, which makes it difficult to assign users nationalities.

Moreover, platform shifts, in which a thread on one platform is linked to another on a different platform, are challenging for researchers. Abbreviations, neologisms, the mixture of different languages and incomplete sentence structure are characteristics of internet conversations and pose further challenges.[22] Automated content analysis by programs is thus more difficult and poses an additional set of challenges.[23] One way of coping with these intricacies is embedded research. The role, whether active or passive, that researchers adopt during the data collection process can have serious consequences for the internal validity of a research design and raises a subset of ethical questions. If researchers manage to assume a completely passive/observational role in the data collection process at all times, they will presumably not influence the observed communication processes – which might be of utmost importance for the validity of the research findings. However, there are often limits to observational roles (for instance, via targeted questions to the researcher's profile) and there is a fine line to walk between non-intrusive and intrusive observations.

From an ethical perspective, privacy settings are also relevant for the implementation of a research project. If settings are chosen that make content publicly viewable, a researcher's analysis of such data is seen to constitute less of an invasion of the subject's privacy than if the data was only shared among 'friends' or an even smaller user-defined subset of selected persons. Ethical questions that arise when conducting research with data from social media are accompanied by legal questions. Since possible damage can be neither completely avoided nor comprehensively anticipated, the aim of both ethical reflection and legal requirements is to establish a balanced relationship between expected benefits of research and privacy interests.[24] Even if legal requirements and ethical considerations are interdependent and can only be understood as a package, both need to be addressed separately by researchers. Below we address legal recommendations we have extracted from the literature.

3 Central Data Protection Principles – Legal Limits, Challenges and Opportunities for Researchers

In social media in general, but particularly in social networks, individuals (and groups) often reveal a great deal of information about themselves. They may provide personal information such as their ethnic origin, political opinions, religious and ideological convictions, sex habits, sexual orientation, health and affiliations, such as trade union membership. Some of this personal information may be of interest to researchers conducting studies in various fields. If, in whatever context, personal data is to be collected or used, data protection regulations must be observed. In the following, we provide an overview of the data protection legal framework of observational empirical social research in social media based on the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR).[25]

Although the regulation contains several important privileges for scientific research, it gives no special grounds for processing. The legality of processing for research purposes is often assessed on the basis of a balance of interests in each individual case. Some personal data is particularly sensitive and is therefore subject to increased protection (for example, religious beliefs or political views that are of great relevance for examining extremist content on social media platforms). Depending on the research project, researchers may also be confronted with limits, challenges and opportunities. These will be discussed below, divided between whether consent was obtained or not, since this is of crucial importance.

Legal regulations for research with personal data with the consent of the persons concerned'

Much of the data available in social media is personal. Even if this information can be accessed online without significant barriers and was deliberately posted by the persons concerned, it is still protected as personal data by the GDPR. The collection and analysis of personal data is inevitable in many research projects. In the European Union, the legal protection applicable to such personal information is set out in the regulation.[26] Since the GDPR does not provide for specific authorisation for the processing of personal data for the purposes of scientific research, the permissibility of data processing is governed in particular by articles 5, 6 and 9. According to the GDPR, the processing of personal data is generally prohibited unless this is expressly permitted by law or with the consent of the person concerned.

25 The GDPR is applicable as of 25 May 2018 in all EU member states. The goal is to harmonise data privacy laws across Europe.

26 The scope of the regulation includes all kinds and forms of "handling" data and thus the collection, storage, structuring and so on. See article 4 (2) GDPR.

By giving or refusing consent, a person can decide on the disclosure and use of their personal data. They must be given the opportunity to decide in each individual case whether and under what conditions their data may be processed. In order to ensure this, the data protection regulations for consenting to the processing of personal data specify certain content and formal requirements for consent. According to the GDPR, these are in particular the specific designation of the intended purpose of the use of the data, sufficient information of the data subject about the intended processing of their data, the voluntary nature of the consent and the possibility of revoking the consent to any time of the research process.

In addition to the declared consent of a person, data may also be used by researchers if the data subject has consciously published sensitive data. In such a case, article 9 (2) (e) of the regulation lifts the processing prohibition under paragraph 1 and the data subject has no special need for protection. The conscious publication of the data by the data subject can be seen as a kind of waiver of the special protection of article 9. Nevertheless, even if the data is published by the person concerned, the data is not completely removed from the GDPR's protection.[27] In particular, article 6 applies and the data still requires a legal basis for processing, even if article 9 has been waived.[28]

This leads to a question: what is meant by data that has been "made public"? Data is considered to be made public if it is made available to the public by an unspecified number of persons without any significant barrier to admission. Consequently, another central aspect in relation to data protection requirements concerns the type of social media from which the data originated. Does it come from open or closed (parts of) social media, or from social media set up specifically for research purposes? The primary demarcation criterion here is the "access hurdle through registration and login".[29] Depending on the platform, users have the possibility to limit the addressees of their content. Some social media is set up specifically for research purposes, wherein user consent to the processing of personal data proves to be a practicable solution, but this is not the case with other social media. Consequently, the legal requirements for the processing of personal data become relevant. This also applies if the data collected stems from publicly available sources.[30] Moreover, "public information can fall within the scope of private life where it is systematically collected and stored in files held by the authorities".[31] In addition, individuals also have a right to privacy even when they willingly enter the public arena. Data from semi-public or even closed communication spaces is even more in need of protection than data from public spaces.

28 At this point it should be noted that article 6 GDPR is also applicable at the same time as article 9 GDPR. The two then stand side by side and must both be fulfilled.

However, as mentioned above, obtaining consent may often jeopardise research or is simply impossible due to the sheer number of people whose consent would have to be obtained. This is not only the case in research on radicalised or extremist individuals or collectives, but also in many other sensitive research areas. For this reason, below we turn to the legal regulations for research with personal data without the consent of the persons concerned.

Legal regulations for research with personal data without the consent of the persons concerned

Since research often has to rely on personal data in order to achieve research objectives, legislators have laid down eligibility criteria for research. This allows restrictions to be placed on the right to informative self-determination for the purpose of scientific research. If data is used for an investigation that does not fall into the specific categories of article 9 of the GDPR, the lawfulness of its processing is governed exclusively by article 6 instead. Accordingly, at least one of the bases set out in this article must apply when personal data is processed. Consequently, the processing of personal data without consent is only permissible in limited circumstances: for example, if either the data subject's legitimate interests are not affected at all or the public interest in carrying out the research project outweighs the data subject's legitimate interests and the research purpose cannot otherwise be achieved or only with disproportionate effort. If such a condition is met, the research may be carried out without the consent of the person(s) concerned. The lawfulness of processing without consent often depends on a balance between the right to privacy and the benefits of the research. In any case, it is necessary to weigh the research interest against the data subject's legitimate interests.

In accordance with article 9 (2) (j) of the GDPR, there are also statutory provisions for the processing of special categories of personal data for research purposes: first, the existence of a specific research question and concept. For the purpose of scientific research, researchers must show that the respective research project meets scientific requirements in terms of its structure and content. Second, researchers must prove the impracticability of the project without the concrete personal data. Researchers need therefore to explain in detail why it is urgently necessary for the research project to collect the relevant personal data. For example, scientists should ask themselves whether research could be conducted with less data or other types of data. Third, interests must be balanced again, such as the quantity of data and the special circumstances of subjects. Thus, in order to legitimise data processing for research purposes without the consent of the data subject, it must be shown why the research interest (significantly) outweighs the interest of the data subject in the protection of their data.

To this end, the principles of necessity, appropriateness and proportionality of the processing of personal data must be observed and access regulations must be established to ensure that personal data is used in accordance with data protection regulations: first, researchers must demonstrate that the project pursues a legitimate purpose. It is true that research in general may be viewed as a legitimate purpose.[32] Nevertheless, the processing of personal data for a research project without the consent of the data subjects should only be considered if the research purpose cannot be achieved by other means.[33] Necessity is to be understood as another precondition for proportionality. A measure is necessary if no milder – that is, less intrusive – measure could achieve the same goal. The necessity test should be considered the first step with which a proposed measure involving the processing of personal data must comply. Should the respective measure not pass the necessity test, there is no need to examine its proportionality. A measure that is not proven to be necessary should be modified to meet the requirement of necessity.

The processing of data obtained online without consent of the data project must also be appropriate. The principle of appropriateness requires that the content and form of action not exceed the necessary level to achieve the objectives. In order to examine the appropriateness of the intervention, researchers must weigh up the legal justification for carrying out the intervention (often based on the perceived societal benefit of the research) against the obligation to protect the individual whose privacy is violated by the intervention. After this consideration, researchers must also demonstrate that, according to article 89 of the GDPR, measures and safeguards to protect data subjects, such as, for example, pseudonymisation, are respected.

Another relevant aspect when considering the research project from a data protection perspective refers to the researcher's activity or passivity. The question of whether the researchers are passive observers when collecting the data – that is, whether they have chosen a non-reactive collection method – also has an impact on data protection requirements. In the case of such a procedure, the researcher does not take an active role at any time and does not enter into the discourse. Although such passive observation also rules out obtaining consent from the outset,[34] the intervention is kept to a minimum in that no influence is exerted on what is commented on or posted. Meanwhile, engaging in research with an active approach means that it is possible to obtain consent for the collection and analysis of personal data, but this also introduces the risk of producing interfering content, (further) advancing the discourse or potentially influencing the posting behaviour of others.

Individuals whose consent cannot be obtained should be offered further protection. According to article 89 (1) of the GDPR, technical and organisational measures must be taken to ensure, in particular, that the principle of data economy is respected. Important aspects in this respect are the reduction in the amount of data collected and limiting the scope of processing solely to the extent necessary for the purpose, the specification of a storage period, and a regulation on the accessibility of the data. Insofar as the purposes pursued can also be achieved with anonymised or pseudonymised data, article 89 (1), sentences 3 and 4, of the GDPR stipulates that this needs to be the case. As far as data archiving is concerned, role concepts and secure access solutions are obvious.[35]

Furthermore, even if personal data may be processed (by virtue of consent or a legal provision), technical and organisational measures must be taken to ensure that the purposes of data protection are met. For example, this could be achieved by storing identifiers and data separately. In addition, the data should be earmarked for a specific purpose. Information therefore will only be held and examined for the purpose for which it was collected.

4 Data Source, Platform Policies and Researchers – Overview, Interplay and Recommendations

In addition to ethical principles and data protection regulations, users and researchers must comply with and take into account the legal agreements of the respective platform, as well as other individual restrictions when using third-party programs. The fact that, on the one hand, leading platforms utilise different policies and, on the other, such policies are often long or difficult to understand poses a challenge of its own. Below we provide a brief overview of the most relevant policies of leading tech companies and derive some general recommendations.

Twitter

With Twitter's new privacy policy, which is in accordance with the GDPR and came into effect in May 2018, Twitter gives its users more control over their data. Since it applies to every user regardless of their location, it appears that GDPR protection will be extended to all users around the globe. Twitter collects information about the IP address and device type from users as soon as they are look at tweets. Of course, data is also generated and collected when a user sends tweets, interacts with other users, retweets, likes and more. According to Twitter's privacy policy, direct messaging content is excluded from data collection and processing. The collected data is used to suggest tweets, track accounts and target advertising. To a certain extent, Twitter offers its users controls about what kinds of data are allowed to be collected. For instance, users can set their accounts to public or private and turn on or off photo-tagging by others. Users can also download information that was shared by the user on Twitter. For example, in addition to public tweets, which "are immediately viewable and searchable by anyone around the world", users are also given the opportunity to use "non-public ways to communicate on Twitter too, through protected Tweets and Direct Messages".[36] Additionally, it is also possible to use Twitter under a pseudonym and "data is kept for up to 18 months, or until account deletion".[37] With the launch of its API v2 in August 2020, "Twitter is making it easier for businesses, academics, and third-party developers to build on its platform":[38] it offers third-party developers access to features long absent from their clients, including "conversation threading, poll results in Tweets, pinned Tweets on profiles, spam filtering, and a more powerful stream filtering and search query language".[39] In addition, there is also access to a real-time tweet stream.

API access has been reorganised by Twitter on three levels: during the early access period it was possible "to listen and to analyse the public conversation".[40] However, since only the free, basic access level has been launched, which limits the number of API calls developers can make, it remains to be seen what changes and opportunities will arise for researchers. A central advantage of Twitter compared to other social networks is its open communication. Individual tweets as well as entire conversations can be searched and viewed by anyone, regardless of whether they are a user or have a Twitter mutual following with the person in question. Thus researchers have access to not only comprehensive and unfiltered data but also data protection. One limitation of researching Twitter is that data use must not harm its economic interests. The creation, enrichment and distribution of large databases with tweets is prohibited, even for non-commercial purposes.[41] Results cannot be weighed or compared because researchers do not have information about overall Twitter activity.

Facebook

Similar to Twitter, Facebook has not only revised its data protection policy in accordance with GDPR but also made it applicable to its customers worldwide. Facebook, Instagram, Messenger and other products and features offered by Facebook collect different types of information depending on a user's interactions with Facebook products. This includes information and uploaded content, data of a user's social networks (such as the accounts, groups, hashtags and so on with which they interact), usage information and data on internal platform purchases, as well as data on other users' interactions with a user's content and profiles. In addition, data is collected on devices connected to Facebook or Instagram, including device attributes, cursor movements, internet providers, phone companies and device settings. Facebook uses this data to refine its own products and customise content and account recommendations. It also makes the data available to third party customers. In addition, data is not only shared with advertisers, but also with third parties who run apps on Facebook or otherwise use its services. As with other social media platforms, users can restrict data collection through their settings, as well as download and access the user data collected on them. Some data is subject to special protections: users can choose to provide Facebook information about their religious or political views, health, racial or ethnic origins, philosophical beliefs or trade union membership.[42] Although Facebook recently has made some improvements in terms of privacy,[43] the user interface is still not transparent enough. Furthermore, in contrast to personalised advertising, users can barely limit data collection. Facebook gives its users the possibility to access their Facebook information, including photos, posts, reactions and comments using the so-called "Access Your Information" tool. Additionally, users are able to download a copy of their Facebook information using the "Download Your Information" tool.

Facebook also provides researchers and academics information and content to conduct research.[44] In response to the Cambridge Analytica debacle in 2018, Facebook promised a research initiative to give academics access to its data while keeping user information private. Despite launching a new data access hub to give researchers the opportunity to see all the Facebook datasets available to them, Facebook continues to be criticised[45] for failing to support researchers sufficiently.

Google

Google, unlike Facebook and Twitter, seems to have so far refrained from applying its revised privacy policy, which is in line with the GDPR, to regions outside the EU. For example, it has been reported that users in the UK will lose GDPR protection and now have to accept that, unlike in the EU, where it must be stored on servers in accordance with GDPR rules, their data is stored in the USA – and this means that data protection levels vary according to guidelines that service provides by and large set themselves. As YouTube is only one part of Google's empire, which consists of dozens of apps, services and a mobile operating system, the company is therefore likely to collect more data about its users than, for example, Twitter or Facebook. Among other things, YouTube collects data on user interaction, comments, video uploads, video consumption and much more. While YouTube does share user data with third parties who post ads on the site and provides an API, it is explicitly stated that YouTube does not sell data to third parties, such as other social media companies. YouTube offers users who want access to their data numerous options to review and even delete data.

TikTok

Unlike many large social media companies, TikTok takes a regionally segmented approach to privacy policy. In Europe, for example, there is a directive that takes certain GDPR requirements into account. For the USA and other countries, separate guidelines apply. In addition to the usual data points (usage activities, device information, location data, phonebook when accessed, information on third-party content shared on the platform), content is also collected and analysed. TikTok does not appear to provide researchers with access to an API or other means to collect data legally. Instead, IT specialists have found ways to create unofficial APIs to collect data on users, views and interactions.[46]

Telegram

Similar to TikTok, Telegram also maintains a separate privacy policy for European users. As communication platform, Telegram only stores basic information about users (telephone number, email address, username, and so on). Regular chats (which are called "cloud chats") between users and group chats are also stored. Secret chats are said to be fully encrypted throughout, and only visible to users who are involved in them. Telegram also does not provide researchers with any means of collecting and analysing data, such as an API. However, researchers have created their own scraper to access public channels, interactions and messages for research purposes.[47] While scraping is an attractive tool for evaluating social networks for research purposes, it represents, in terms of legality and ethical considerations, a particularly contested way of retrieving data.[48]

General Recommendations

The picture from this overview is at best diffuse: some data is available to researchers, depending on the platform. Generally, platforms reserve the rights to data, and to process or pass it on. However, not all platforms have clearly spelled out the access points and terms of reference for scientific use. A further opening up of many tech companies to science would also be desirable with clear-cut, durable and harmonised APIs and with regard to searches (for instance, for datasets that are created using a search term). On Twitter, for example, tweets linked by replies are not included in search results. Data Grants[49] is a pilot programme to give researchers access to public and historical data, but such access is limited to a few projects selected by Twitter.

The research and investigation of often violent political online extremism is high on the agendas of various political and societal institutions as well as of technology companies. Databases with user data are, as discussed earlier in this report, subject to the respective national data protection regulations. These limit, for good reasons, the sharing of existing data with other scientists domestically and, particularly, internationally. In this context it is worth questioning researchers' potential use of collected data for further analysis and projects. While the GDPR applies to all EU member states, rules for collaboration with outside partners are less clear, even though there is an increasing convergence of standards around the world and tech companies like Facebook implement and push for global rules.

While there still exists a variety of constraints, the tendency is promising. Furthermore, there are certain privileges for researchers in most data protection regulations, including the GDPR. If certain principles are balanced systematically and transparently in data protection strategies for given research projects and in close discussion with data protection officers (and, in some instances, with the platforms), the necessary analyses and access to findings for further researchers are possible in almost every case. Still, there are some limits to reproducing results if data is retrieved from encrypted spaces and under conditions of pseudonymisation or anonymisation.

This is aggravated by the fact that more and more extremist content is quickly deleted. If deleted extremist content were to be safely hosted, researchers with access to such content would likely find themselves able to provide more thorough analysis. In this regard, there is much to discuss with online and print academic publishers, for instance, around ensuring a high degree of external validity for a published study without providing incentives for violating data protection requirements and research ethics. If this balance is not struck, research will yield far too few relevant results.

Close cooperation between tech companies and researchers regarding knowledge-sharing, technical collaboration and shared research is a win-win situation for both sides. Researchers could make much more use of flagging problematic content, for instance, but they should critically engage with the implications of flagging according to the ethical standards outlined above. Tech companies need to be transparent about their mechanisms for dealing with flagged content and aware of the ethical and research-practical challenges researchers face in this regard. One solution could be the provision of an option to deal with content flagged by researchers differently from other content: companies could monitor such content closely without deleting it. An example of successful cooperation between tech companies and researchers is the Global Internet Forum to Counter Terrorism (GIFCT). One of GIFCT's central objectives is to "empower researchers to study terrorism and counterterrorism, including creating and evaluating best practices for multi-stakeholder cooperation and preventing abuse of digital platforms".[50] GNET is funded by GIFCT and the dialogues that this enables – both critical and open – are immensely valuable and need to continued permanently if they are to deepen.

There are several tools or at least initiatives across platforms that are of interest to researchers working with public content from social media. CrowdTangle[51] is one such tool, which allows for analysing public content in social media and compiling it into reports. CrowdTangle makes accessible the timing of a post, the type of contribution (video, image, text) and information about which page, public account or public group it was posted to and how many interactions (e.g. "Like" information, reactions, comments, how often the contribution was shared) or video views it generated, as well as which other public pages or accounts have shared it. While this is a good start, there is room for improvement and expansion. Among other things, criticism has been levelled at CrowdTangle that it is not particularly useful to researchers since it is difficult to scan for patterns not identified in advance.[52] Moreover, many research projects require specifically non-public data. Besides CrowdTangle or a possible revision of its offering, more initiatives are welcome. As users shift from one platform to another, as extremist networks span various platforms and as content is increasingly cross-posted across platforms, cross-cutting tools would be a boost for further research and would bring more disciplines and scholars on board to analyse the various social and political challenges that arise from the online dynamics of extremism: more of such initiatives are needed and welcomed.

However, the CrowdTangle Link Checker Chrome Extension is available to all interested parties. The extension shows how often a URL has been shared, which public pages or accounts have shared the URL and the interaction data for these posts.

5 Concluding Remarks

Some researchers still avoid working with data from social media or embark upon research projects without giving data protection issues and ethical principles sufficient attention – or any at all. In order to reduce the hesitation felt by researchers, this report has offered insights into the key ethical considerations and data protection requirements that scientists are confronted with when working with personal data from social media, and outlined challenges and limitations such work poses. Despite these hurdles, we cannot and should not avoid the analysis of data from the digital world. Online and offline worlds have long been closely linked. In order to better understand phenomena, a consideration of both worlds is inevitable. Thus, our goal is to encourage other researchers to work with data from social media. To this end, the report also pointed out opportunities.

Whenever possible, researchers must fulfil their duties and responsibilities and mitigate any risk against research subjects. Researchers should also obtain informed consent whenever possible, delete highly identifiable information and reserve the acquisition of informed consent to the dissemination stage of a project. Researchers must consider ethical and data protection requirements at all stages of a research project (from its very beginning until the dissemination of results and the handling of the data after completion of a project).

Data from different platforms is of interest to researchers. The privacy policies applied by individual tech companies are as different as the platforms themselves. While there is some overlap – for example, Facebook and Twitter comply with GDPR requirements for their global users – there are also differences, some of which have been discussed in this article. Although more emphasis has been placed on a user-friendly policy in recent years, not least because of increased requirements and pressure on platform operators, it is often unclear what opportunities are available to researchers. There is an urgent need for further improvements in terms of rights and access for researchers across platforms. Even if there have been positive developments, there is a need for tech companies to make further concessions to researchers. At the same time, researchers should also make more use of existing offers from tech companies – and they should do so in accordance with the basic ethical and legal principles that this report outlined and that are, rightly used in a research designs, less constraints than enablers.

Policy Landscape

This section is authored by Armida van Rij and Lucy Thomas, both Research Associates at the Policy Institute based at King's College London. It provides an overview of the relevant policy landscape for this report.

Introduction

Researching terrorist and/or extremist contents has for decades brought forth challenging questions on the legality, morality and practicality for researchers, governments, activists and law enforcement agencies alike. On the one hand, there is data protection legislation and the constraints by which researchers must operate when handling personal data. On the other, there is the legislation around counterterrorism and the ways in which terrorist and extremist data may be used for research purposes. This creates an increasingly complex field for researchers to navigate, with risks to themselves and others.

In this report, we will take a slightly different approach to previous reports, in that we will address the policy landscape on personal data protection in eight of the nine countries first. Then the report will give an in-depth overview of the counterterrorism landscape in the ninth country, the UK, and address some of the difficult questions researchers interested in researching terrorism may come across.

Data protection on social media platforms: addressing the challenges and assessing new developments

Canada

The Office of the Privacy Commissioner of Canada (OPC) has responsibility for the protection and promotion of individuals' data privacy rights. The OPC's mandate includes enforcing compliance with both the Privacy Act, which governs how federal government agencies handle personal data, and the Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act (PIPEDA), which covers the private sector. PIPEDA is a federal law, but the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Quebec have individual data privacy laws that are substantively similar.[53]

Generally speaking, PIPEDA obliges private organisations to "obtain an individual's consent when they collect, use or disclose that individual's personal information," and comply with legislative demands to safeguard that data. Under PIPEDA, corporations must follow ten 'fair information principles' to ensure individuals' data rights are protected, including accountability, consent, limiting collection, limiting use, disclosure, and retention, accuracy and safeguards.[54]

53 'PIPEDA in brief,' Office of the Privacy Commissioner of Canada. Accessed: https://www.priv.gc.ca/en/privacy-topics/privacy-laws-in-canada/the-personal-information-protection-and-electronic-documents-act-pipeda/pipeda_brief/

As well as horizon-scanning research to scope out new technologies and their impact on Canadians' data rights,[55] PIPEDA also gives the OPC enforcement powers for breaches of data protection. These enforcement powers include investigatory powers and financial disincentives – companies who fail to report data breaches to the OPC can be fined up to $100,000. Similarly to New Zealand, this fine falls far below those of other jurisdictions, such as the GDPR's €20,000,000 (or up to 4% of total annual turnover).

In November 2020, Canada's Minister of Innovation, Science and Industry proposed a new piece of legislation to protect personal data. In a press release, the ministry cited the coronavirus pandemic as the context for modernising and updating privacy laws, since many more individuals are making use of technology to communicate with one another.[56]

The proposed legislation, the Digital Charter Implementation Act (DCIA), would establish a new privacy law for the private sector including social media platforms. The DCIA would include far stronger oversight and enforcement powers for breaches – up to 5% of revenue or $25 million – as well as requiring transparency from businesses relating to their use of algorithms and artificial intelligence. The DCIA would mean that "Businesses would have to be transparent about how they use such systems to make significant predictions, recommendations or decisions about individuals. Individuals would also have the right to request that businesses explain how a prediction, recommendation or decision was made by an automated decision-making system and explain how the information was obtained."[57] Ghana's Data Protection Act 2012 has a similar clause (see below).

European Commission

As part of the European Commission's initiative to "get Europe fit for the digital age", the EC has concentrated on regulating the many facets that digital services comprise. This includes personal data protection and privacy. The European Union's data privacy is regulated by the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR). The GDPR came into force in 2016. It serves to "protects citizens' fundamental right to data protection whenever personal data is used by criminal law enforcement authorities for law enforcement purposes" and to " will in particular ensure that the personal data of victims, witnesses, and suspects of crime are duly protected and will facilitate cross-border cooperation in the fight against crime and terrorism".[58] Crucially, it applies to companies who operate within the European market, regardless of where they are based. This means that companies such as Google also need to abide by GDPR principles or risk being fined and/or sued.

Alongside the GDPR, a European Data Protection Supervisor was also established. This is an independent EU body, tasked with ensuring compliance and handling any complaints under the GDPR.[59]

Aside from protecting the rights of citizens, the GDPR also gave relevant authorities the tools to ensure compliance and aimed to increase accountability for those who handle personal data. Since 2018, when all EU member states needed to have put into action the GDPR, thousands of complaints have been filed, and hundreds of fines have been issued for breaching the regulation. Perhaps one of the most high-profile was France's fining of Google for "lack of transparency, inadequate information and lack of valid consent regarding ads personalisation" and issuing a €50,000,000 fine.[60]

In addition to the GDPR, there is also the Data Protection Law Enforcement Directive. Directive 2016/680 relates to the processing of personal data by law enforcement agencies where one is a suspected perpetrator, a witness or a victim of crime.[61] However, the delineation between the GDPR and Directive 2016/680 in their respective scopes of application is blurred, with a risk that one data processing operation might fall under the GDPR in EU member states, but under the Directive in others.[62]

Finally, there is the EU Directive on the Security of Network and Information Systems (NIS), which provides legal measures to boost cybersecurity.[63] This is in particular related to: enhancing member states' preparedness; increasing cooperation among member states; reinforcing vital infrastructure across the EU.[64]

While data privacy regulation has, to some extent, jurisdictional limits, the EC is also seeking to implement the e-Privacy Regulation (replacing the e-Privacy Directive).[65] This regulation, in turn, seeks to protect the privacy of citizens on online platforms, such as messenger applications. While the European Parliament has adopted the e-Privacy Regulation, discussions have stalled at the European Council level.[66] Some have argued that this emphasis on data protection is in contradiction to the EU's counter-terrorism legislation.[67]

France

France, as an EU member state, implemented the GDPR in May 2018 and the NIS in 2019. If and when the European Council is able to conclude negotiations on the e-Privacy Directive, as discussed above, the Directive will govern citizens' data protection alongside the GDPR and the NIS.

A requirement under the NIS is the establishment of a data protection authority. In France this is the Commission Nationale de l'Informatique et des Libertés (CNIL). So far CNIL has issued fines to Google and others for breaching the GDPR.

Ghana

Ghana's flagship data privacy legislation is codified in its Data Protection Act, passed in 2012. Similarly to such other countries as Canada and New Zealand, the Act establishes a Data Protection Commission (DPC), which has oversight and enforcement powers to ensure compliance with the Act's responsibilities.[68]

The Data Protection Act 2012 covers both public and private sector data controllers, obliging them to abide by eight data protection principles, including accountability, specification of purpose and openness.[69] Akin to other countries, the DPC has the power to impose fines on data controllers that breach responsibilities as laid out in the Act.

One of the most innovative aspects of Ghana's Data Protection Act, especially considering that it was passed in 2012, is a clause that gives individuals the right to freedom from automated decision-making. This clause means that "important decisions about you based on your personal details should have a human input and must not be automatically generated, unless you agree to this."[70] This modern and consent-based model for automated and algorithmic data processing could potentially have far-reaching consequences for the ways in which researchers could access and process social media data using software. Although the clause currently relates to information that "significantly affects that individual,"[71] if the Ghanaian government moves to strengthen that clause, it could mean that researchers would have difficulty in using automated data-scraping software.

However, the Data Protection Act 2012 currently undermines its citizens' data rights via a clause stating that "personal data which is processed for research purposes … may be kept indefinitely."[72] Furthermore, if "the data is processed in compliance with the relevant conditions" then "personal data which is processed only for research purposes is exempt from the provisions of this Act."[73] This severely compromises individuals' data rights since researchers can meet the minimum requirements for data protection and otherwise process the data in an unethical manner. The broad and vague definition of 'research' also means that individual data rights can be imperilled with relative ease.

Japan

Provisions for data protection in Japan are made by the Act on the Protection of Personal Information 2003 (APPI). The responsibility to enforce compliance with the APPI lies with the Personal Information Protection Commission (PPC), established in 2016 in order to centralise previously disparate regulatory authorities.

The PPC has lower-than-average oversight and enforcement powers: data breaches can result in fines and imprisonment. However, the fines for breaches are extremely low – up to ¥300,000 (just above £2,000, or around $2,800).[74] The APPI also does not insist upon any direct obligations on entities that process personal data, but rather imposes light-touch supervisory and guidance measures. This is especially important as regards academic research, since the APPI is extended in terms of its territorial scope beyond Japan, so that anyone handling data about Japanese individuals – even if this handling takes place outside Japan – is obliged only to abide by these light-touch measures.

The APPI was revised and amended in 2020, with significant consequences. Unlike the general global trend towards strengthening citizens' data rights, the 2020 amendments relax a data processor's obligations significantly. For pseudonymously processed information, the purpose of data use may be changed beyond the scope of original use, the obligations to notify the PPC of a data breach no longer apply and individuals no longer have the right to access, correct or request the cessation of use of their data.[75]

In another setback for individual data rights, researchers are also exempted from the APPI, since it "only applies to persons or entities that handle personal information in the course of their business."[76] In reality, this means that Japanese citizens whose personal data is accessed and processed by researchers have very few data rights.

New Zealand

In New Zealand, the Office of the Privacy Commissioner (OPC) has responsibility for the protection of personal information and data. The office was established in 1993 as part of the Privacy Act of the same year, New Zealand's first substantive piece of legislation to govern personal data. This legislation controls how personal information is "collected, used, disclosed, stored, and given access to."[77] The OPC's functions are both reactive and proactive: not only does it investigate complaints about breaches of privacy and enforces compliance with the Privacy Act, but the Commissioner also monitors developments in emerging technologies for their potential impact on individual privacy.[78]

In December 2020, new legislation came into force in New Zealand that protects personal information: the Privacy Act 2020. The new act was proposed "in response to the way technology has revolutionized the handling of personal data,"[79] since the nature and volume of personal data has changed almost beyond recognition since 1993. Given this, changes to the 1993 act are remarkably few; the current commissioner stated that this was because "the Privacy Act is a technology-neutral piece of legislation with a principle-based approach that has made it resilient in the face of technological changes."[80]

The main change in the new act is to protect New Zealanders' personal data abroad: information can now not be "disclosed overseas unless there are safeguards comparable to New Zealand law."[81] The 2020 act also explicitly has an "extraterritorial effect" built in to it, so that any business operating in New Zealand will be subject to the data protection obligations, even if there is no physical presence there.[82] These jurisdictional points are interesting, since many major tech and social media companies are based overseas, particularly in the United States – which has weaker data protection laws. With many countries adopting similar legislation, international pressure is increased on the USA to toughen up its own data privacy laws to keep up with overseas obligations.

The Privacy Act 2020 also gives the OPC greater enforcement powers, including increasing the maximum fine for breaches of privacy principles from $2,000 to $10,000. In terms of the international context, this fine falls far below those of other jurisdictions, such as the GDPR's €20,000,000 (or up to 4% of total annual turnover), or Australia's $10,000,000 maximum. Additionally, New Zealand's new act failed to reflect the GDPR's "right to be forgotten," in which individuals can request personal information to be deleted.[83] This right is particularly important considering data ethics as it relates to research, since users posting extremist content on social media platforms – content that may be used for research purposes – have the right to delete it.

UN Counter-Terrorism Committee Executive Directorate

As for within the UN system, data protection there falls under the scope of work of the UN Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD). UNCTAD has discussed the need to balance data protection with surveillance and the challenges this brings. It has described how, following a high profile court case referred to the European Court of Justice, there is now "a direction to place conditions and restrictions on surveillance in any data protection regime in Europe, and this may have knock-on effects on all those jurisdictions that follow European law closely."[84]

Jurisdiction is another incredibly difficult area, particularly when it comes to online data protection. UNCTAD notes that the GDPR has an extraterritoriality clause, article 3, which in effect tries to ensure "local data protection" that is targeted at local residents, regardless of the location of the business.[85]

United States

Unlike many other nations, the USA has no central federal privacy law. Instead, there are several data privacy laws that focus on separate aspects of data privacy – for instance, health data is protected by the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act 1996 and personal data held by the government is subject to the US Privacy Act of 1974.

Crucially, personal data and data privacy on the internet in the United States currently has no federal regulation. In the USA, the internet is somewhat of a regulatory Wild West, in which individuals, groups, organisations and corporations can access and process data without specific data rights regulation.

At present, the only way for individual data rights to be protected on social media platforms is via the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). For instance, in 2019 the FTC was able to levy a huge $5,000,000,000 fine from Facebook for violating privacy as part of the Cambridge Analytica scandal.[86] The FTC investigated and fined Facebook under its powers as laid out in Section 5, which relates to "unfair or deceptive acts or practices." Facebook shared users' personal information with third-party apps downloaded by a users' 'friends', but since many users were unaware of these practices and did not have recourse to opt out of them, it constituted an unfair or deceptive act.[87] This legal point is important, since it means that if a company does not disclose information about their data processing or handling, it cannot be held liable against the "unfair or deceptive acts or practices" clause.

A handful of states have passed legislation to protect consumer data privacy, most importantly California. Since many of the major social media and tech companies are based in California, data protection regulation there is of great importance. The California Online Privacy Protection Act 2004 was the first act to require websites to post their privacy policies and crucially this extends to any website that Californians can access, which therefore obliges virtually all American websites to comply.

On 1 January 2020, the California Consumer Privacy Act (CCPA) came into effect. The CPPA is a landmark for US data protection, since it applies to "for-profit businesses that do business in California" or meet other requirements relating to revenue and Californians' data. In practice, this means that major tech and social media companies fall under the CPPA's scope. The CCPA guarantees individuals the right to know what personal information is collected about them, the right to delete this information, the right to opt-out of the sale of their personal information. Businesses are required to give consumers notices to explain their privacy practices.[88]

The passage of the CPPA and the FTC's Facebook fine signal a political appetite in the USA to protect individuals' data rights. In February 2020, Senator Kirsten Gillibrand proposed a sweeping data protection act that would establish an independent federal enforcement agency.[89] Although this falls short of guaranteeing specific privacy rights and obligations for all Americans, it suggests that the USA may be moving in the direction of establishing federal legislation.

Researching Extremist Content in the UK: Prevent, counter-terrorism legislation and policy developments

In the wake of the terror attacks on 11 September 2001 in New York City and the Pentagon in the USA, many Western nations tightened their internal security measures in an attempt to prevent attacks on their own soil. Counter-terrorism policy in the West became increasingly concerned with and centred around the notion of radicalisation – that individuals can increasingly come to identify with terrorist values, eventually coming to espouse them or even carry out violent attacks for terrorist causes. This process of radicalisation has been attributed to a wide range of social and individual factors: exposure to ideology, victimisation, alienation, socialisation, social networks, the internet, deficiencies in family bonds, trauma, relative social and economic deprivation, and "cultures of violence".[90] Given the sheer number of possible 'routes to radicalisation', governments have come to "believe that they can pre-empt future terrorist attacks through a range of interventions in everyday life."[91]

In 2003, the Home Office in the UK launched the Prevent strategy as part of its wider counter-terrorism strategy, CONTEST. Prevent was revised and relaunched in 2011, in order to target individuals who are 'vulnerable' to radicalisation,[92] particularly within civic institutions such as schools, registered childcare providers, universities, colleges, prisons, probation services, healthcare, social services and immigration enforcement. The Prevent strategy occupies the 'pre-criminal space'[93] – it intervenes before any criminal activity has taken place in the hopes of disrupting the radicalisation pathway.[94]

93 David Goldberg, Sushrut Jadhav & Tarek Younis (2017), 'Prevent: What is Pre-Criminal Space?', British Journal of Psychology Bulletin, vol. 41 no. 4, pp.208–11.

94 Interestingly, the term 'pre-crime' was coined by Philip K. Dick, author of the science fiction short story Minority Report. See: Goldberg, Jadhav & Younis, pp.208–11.

Prevent is focused on "providing support and re-direction to individuals at risk of, or in the process of being groomed/radicalised into terrorist activity before any crime is committed."[95] By framing Prevent as a safeguarding rather than a criminalising action, Prevent is positioned as a protective rather than a repressive programme. The effect of framing it in this way is that responsibility for operationalising Prevent falls to civic institutions. These institutions, such as universities, are obliged to anticipate, monitor and intervene in possible instances of radicalisation as part of their duty of care. It also means that employees and employers are on the lookout for an impossibly vast, complex and vaguely defined number of indicators that a person is vulnerable to radicalisation. In this environment, institutions understandably take an overly cautious approach.

In its early years, the Prevent strategy in universities focused on student communities, particularly British Muslim students. Institutions began to scrutinise lectures, speaker events and student society events in order to comply with the Prevent strategy and avoid any ambiguity as to whether extremist beliefs were being glorified on campus. There have been countless examples of Muslim students being disproportionately targeted and questioned on campus under the auspices of Prevent,[96] including a student who was referred to the University of Staffordshire's security team for reading a textbook for his postgraduate course on terrorism, crime and global security.[97] Nearly 2,500 events in around 300 universities were either cancelled or modified (for example, speakers disinvited) in 2017–18.

The picture is complicated when it comes to academic researchers who study extremism and terrorism. Exposure to extremist and terrorist content and values is far more obvious and direct, since research often includes the access and collection of terrorist and extremist content, such as official statements released by terrorist groups, terrorist propaganda (including visual media), social media posts in support of extremist views, online messageboards and so on. In particular, research with an emphasis on data collection 'from the field', such as interviews with convicted terrorists or radicalised individuals, means that the researcher is in sustained contact with individuals identified as having extremist or terrorist beliefs.

This opens up interesting questions about the nature of risk in research: can and should academic researchers be understood as vulnerable to radicalisation? What are the implications of this from legal and policy standpoints? What are the effects of this on research and researchers?

The UK's foremost pieces of counter-terrorism legislation, as it relates to researching extremism, are the Terrorism Acts of 2000 and 2006. Sections 57 and 58 of the 2000 act established the possession of materials which "give rise to a reasonable suspicion that his [sic] possession is for a purpose connected with the commission, preparation or instigation of an act of terrorism,"[98] or that that information is "likely to be useful to a person committing or preparing an act of terrorism."[99] In other words, it is a crime to possess any information or material relating to extremism or terrorism, particularly if that information could aid individuals or groups in recruiting or radicalising others, or carrying out violent attacks.

The Terrorism Act of 2006 builds upon and extends the possession offences laid out in the 2000 Act to now also include the dissemination of these materials (section 1) and creates an offence for glorifying terrorism (including via the possession and dissemination of these materials; section 2). The first section refers to individuals or groups who intend to "directly or indirectly encourage or otherwise induce [others] to commit, prepare, or instigate acts of terrorism,"[100] including statements that "glorify the commission or preparation … of such acts."[101] Furthermore, any UK citizen, including researchers, are subject to these offences even when overseas.[102] In other words, a researcher could be overseas on a fellowship or conducting fieldwork and could still be charged by UK law for encouraging terrorism. The second section covers the dissemination of terrorist publications. More specifically, it criminalises the distribution, circulation, giving, selling, lending, offering, sending electronically of terrorist publications or providing services to others that enable them to obtain, read, listen to, look at, acquire, buy or borrow them.[103]

The problems this creates for academics who teach and research extremism and terrorism are clear. A lecturer who shows a video clip of Islamic State propaganda for their seminar class, for example, could be said to committing several offences: the possession of terrorist material, indirectly encouraging others to commit acts of terrorism and disseminating terrorist publications.

Indeed, the 'Nottingham Two' case exemplifies the point. In May 2008, Rizwaan Sabir, a Master's student at the University of Nottingham, was emailing his academic adviser, Hicham Yezza, to prepare his PhD research proposal on Islamic terrorism. Sabir had browsed the US Department of Justice website and downloaded a government document named 'Military Studies in the Jihad Against the Tyrants: the Al-Qaeda Training Manual' (which had been used in a legal trial to prosecute a group responsible for bombings in East Africa).[104] The document was freely available through the university's library system and can be purchased at UK high street bookshops, such as Waterstones.[105] A colleague noticed the document on Yezza's computer and reported it to the university, which notified the police. Both Sabir and Yezza were arrested without a warrant under the Terrorism Act 2000. Sabir was held for seven days in solitary confinement.[106]

The 2000 act has been modified over time and in response to various political and social shifts. The first major development came in 2015 with the passage of the Counter-Terrorism and Security Act, which strengthened institutions' obligations to comply with the Prevent strategy. Universities now have a specific legal duty "to have due regard to the need to prevent people from being drawn into terrorism"[107] and requires them to have clear policies and procedures for researchers working in this area. The 2015 act operates using a risk-based approach, meaning that institutions must continually monitor and assess research activities and act to mitigate any risks these pose. In practice, many universities have now absorbed this Prevent risk assessment into their research ethics procedures.[108] Lived experience of these procedures suggests that ethics review boards have expanded a view of risk that places institutional reputation at the forefront of its concerns. The Prevent strategy could be seen to have empowered institutional review boards to mire research ethics applications – for all types of "risky, 'politically sensitive' research"[109] – in complex and slow bureaucracy in the hopes of "frustrating and deterring potential threats to an institution's reputation."[110] This, in turn, has raised serious concerns over academic freedom.

A second major shift came into force in April 2019 with the passage of the Counter-Terrorism and Border Security Act. The act extended the criminal sentences available for all offences outlined above in the Terrorism Acts of 2000 and 2006; for instance, the maximum sentence for the dissemination of terrorist publications more than doubled, from seven to 15 years' imprisonment.[111]

Four new measures in the 2019 Act crucially impact academic research on extremism and terrorism:

1. The act creates an offence of obtaining or viewing terrorist material over the internet;[112]
2. It explicitly excludes individuals carrying out journalistic work or academic research from the collection of information (including over the internet) (Section 58 of the Terrorism Act 2000) offence;[113]
3. It creates an offence for citizens to enter or remain in a "designated area" outside of the UK.[114] The Secretary of State has the authority to designate such an area on a case-by-case basis, for "the purpose of protecting members of the public from a risk of terrorism";[115]
4. It extends a section of the Terrorism Act 2006 to include the dissemination of terrorist publications as an offence outside the UK (whereas previously it covered only glorification of terrorism).

Point 2 above – the exclusion of academics from the collection of terrorist material (including on the internet) –at first sight seems like a welcome development that reinstates academic freedom to research terrorism and extremism without fear of legal repercussions. However, a crucial point is that although academic researchers are now explicitly exempt from Section 58 of the Terrorism Act 2000 (possession of terrorist materials), there is no explicit legal protection for academics from Sections 1 (glorification of terrorism) or 2 (dissemination of terrorist materials) of the Terrorism Act 2006.[116]

What this means in practice is that academics accessing and collating extremist materials online for research or teaching would likely have a clear legal defence. However, if they excerpted these materials in journal articles or academic books, or showed them in class as examples of extremist propaganda without explicitly denouncing the groups, the researcher could find themselves in murky legal waters. Furthermore, the Terrorism Act 2000 means that researchers can be arrested without a warrant and held for 28 days while charges may be brought against them, as happened to Rizwaan Sabir and Hicham Yezza.

Similarly, researchers conducting fieldwork or data collection overseas may find themselves subject to this new legislation. If an academic was conducting fieldwork overseas, or plans to do so, in an area in which the Secretary of State declared to be a "designated area", it would be an offence to enter or remain.

Overall, the legal picture for researchers of terrorism and extremism is unclear. Although last year's legislation signals an understanding from the government that researchers will be in possession of compromising material, other legislation remains on the books to which academics very much remain subject. Legislation, policy and academia all reflect and entrench the current political climate; in this era of heightened Islamophobia and broad support for anticipatory surveillance and policing, Prevent and the Terrorism Acts very much speak to both phenomena.

An important factor to consider as we weigh up researchers' likelihood to be impacted by the UK government's counter-terrorism governance (such as the Prevent strategy) and legislation is the disproportionate effect on Muslims. "Islamist extremism" makes of 65% of all referrals to Prevent, meaning that "Muslims have an approximate 1 in 500 chance of having been referred to Prevent last year, approximately 40 times more likely than someone who is not a Muslim." Similarly, over half (54%) of terror-related arrests made in 2017 in the UK were of those deemed to have an "Asian ethnic appearance."[117] The statistical reality is that students and researchers racialised and minoritised as Muslim have been at far greater risk from being exploited – either referred to Prevent, or even criminalised – by the legal grey area.

116 "Sections 2 and 3 of the Terrorism Act 2006 also outlaw the dissemination of terrorist publications, including by electronic means, and give a very wide definition of 'terrorist publication' and 'statements' that could be construed as encouraging or inducing the commission preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism. Academic research is not a defence under the Terrorism Act 2006 [emphasis mine]." To date, we have seen that Muslims have been unfairly targeted by counter-terrorism legislation on campus. However, November 2020 saw the greatest ever number of referrals relating to far-right extremism: 43%, compared to 30% for Islamist extremism.[118] This development poses interesting questions about racial profiling and research on extremism and terrorism: will non-Muslim researchers become understood as "vulnerable" and "at risk of radicalisation" for researching white supremacist terrorism? If so, what social and political responses might this trigger? A growing number of critics have come to understand Prevent and counter-terrorism legislation as a mechanism to surveil and control Muslim communities on campus and beyond.[119] If that function has now been established, what function might Prevent now play – if any?

The ethical and legal issues facing researchers seeking to access and process individuals' data are complex and varied. In the face of fast-paced legal and political changes on both national and international scales, the global outlook for researchers working in the areas of extremism and terrorism is one of change and uncertainty.

In terms of access of data for research purposes, there is a general global trend towards strengthening data protection legislation in order to better protect individuals' data rights (with some exceptions, such as Japan above). This means that researchers are likely to be more constrained in the future with regard to the data available to them and the ways in which they can process and use this data. As corporations seek to keep abreast of a patchwork of national and supranational legislation, social media platforms need to update and alter their privacy policies consistently. Since the consequences for not doing so – seen, for instance, in the USA's Federal Trade Commission's $5,000,000,000 Facebook fine – become ever more severe, it is possible that platforms will adopt a more conservative approach to their privacy policies to ensure financial and reputational security.

At the same time, the legal and policy outlook for researchers working in the areas of extremism and terrorism is also uncertain. In the UK, a climate of anticipatory policing justified via national security threats produced a policy environment in which researchers are at risk of being criminalised for their proximity to certain material. As the 'War on Terror' progressed through the 2000s, the UK legislative context reflected a law-and-order approach to counter-terrorism, resulting in several legal developments that constrain the material that academics can access, talk about, write about, teach and publish. However, as global attention shifts away from the so-called 'Islamic threat' and towards a consciousness of violent white supremacy, the existing policy and legal frameworks that were designed to target a minority become problematic.

Present mechanisms of denunciation by colleagues and peers in universities relied on racial profiling to a great extent; how will such approaches function when considering Western researchers working on the areas of white supremacy.

The nature and extent of research into extremism and terrorism in the West may change considerably given this shifting global context in the years to come. For instance, it may become harder to carry out large-scale quantitative analysis if data privacy laws and corporate privacy policies are strengthened, or to access individuals involved in terrorist groups or acts. This could mean that methodologies available to extremism researchers change, perhaps becoming more qualitatively focused, smaller scale or emphasising digital ethnography.[120] Although these shifts are alarming, considerable benefits could be gained: more intimate and nuanced encounters with extremism and terrorism that can better reflect the complexities and contradictions of individuals with extremist beliefs online.

Course Title: LEAD (Law Enforcement Assisted Diversion) Training

Dates: January 19, 2021 Time: 8am -12 pm or 1-5 pm Location : CFCC North Campus

Course Description:

LEAD is a pre-booking diversion program that allows officers to redirect low-level offenders engaged in drugs into community-based services instead of jail and prosecution. LEAD's goals are to reduce the harm a drug offender causes him or herself, as well as the harm that the individual is causing the surrounding community.

MEMORANDUM FOR: All DHS Components

FROM: Pete Gaynor
Acting Secretary

SUBJECT: Expanding the Period of Designation of the 59th Presidential Inauguration as a National Special Security Event

The 59th Presidential Inauguration was designated as a National Special Security Event (NSSE), pursuant to Presidential Policy Directive-22. The period of the 59th Presidential Inauguration as an NSSE currently lasts from January 19 – January 21, 2021.

The Department has received multiple requests, including from Congress and the Mayor of Washington, D.C., to extend the period of the NSSE up to a week in advance of the 59th Presidential Inauguration on January 20, 2021. In light of these requests, recent events at the U.S. Capitol on January 6, 2021, and planned events in Washington, D.C. prior to the inauguration, I have determined that extending the NSSE to begin on January 13, 2021 is necessary to provide for a unified command and control and ensure the safety and security of this special event.

The designation of the 59th Presidential Inauguration for this period of time allows the full resources of the Federal Government to be brought to bear in the development of event security and incident management plans to ensure the safety of all participants.

Intelligence Summary

United States Capitol Riot Data Archives

On January 11, 2021, analysts with the Internet Cover Operations Program (iCOP) identified social media posts from individuals making a collective effort to archive data from the January 6, 2021, protests on the United States Capitol.

Analysis

Background

The violent protests that took place at the United States Capitol building on January 6, 2021, has elicited a response from the major tech companies to remove the alternative Social Media platform, Parler from their respective platforms. Specifically, Google and Apple have removed the mobile application from their App Stores while Amazon has suspended their web hosting services noting that the violent nature of the content violates the terms of service.[i] Parler Chief Executive Officer John Matze informed the public, "There is the possibility Parler will be unavailable on the internet for up to a week as we rebuild from scratch" and "We will try our best to move to a new provider right now as we have many competing for our business".[ii] As of January 10, 2021, at 2359 hours, Parler has been shut down and is no longer accessible.

Parler Website Dump

Twitter user '@donk_enby', an experienced Mobile Reverse Engineer and Data Miner[iii], released an archive of Parler posts made during the January 6, 2021, US Capitol protest (Image 1). The tweet posted on January 9, 2021, at 0820 hours provided a URL to access the archived data which includes raw files of images/videos posted on Parler with metadata.[iv] Additionally, '@donk_enby' provides a Reverse Engineer Parler Application Programming Interface (API) as a Python library with all endpoints present in the iOS app. This provides individuals the ability to identify individuals on the platform, check internal moderators/admins user interfaces, view influencer network status, etc.[v] Please see (Attachment #1 – API Screenshots) below for further details.

Capitol Protest Public Media Server

On January 6, 2021, at 1849 hours, the search engine and data archive company Intelligence X, tweeted that they set up a secure public media server for users to submit pictures and videos for archive and public sharing from the Capitol Protest[vi] (Image 2). The server utilizes features including duplicate management/archival redundancy services, spreadsheet (CSV/XLSX) based viewer with file information/metadata, and 80+ Terabytes of available storage space. Content can be viewed from the web based URL or from Windows File Explorer. As of January 10, 2021, the media server has over 200 Gigabytes of data and has surpassed 10 Terabytes of download traffic.[vii]

Final Assessment

Although Parler is currently inactive and inaccessible, efforts fronted by '@donk_enby', Intelligence X, and public contributions of data can assist law enforcement in the analysis and identification of parties involved in the US Capitol Protests. The archived information can assist in the possible mitigation of future violent protests. For questions regarding this report please contact ISIAR@usps.gov.

Militia Coordination

The Wimkin account 'Vik Freeman' has been promoting the website 'givemebass[.]com' as a portal for communication and coordination which has been posted to multiple militia pages on Wimkin. Image 3 is a screenshot of one of the posts designed for promoting the coordination of militia groups through the site, stating "I am not talking about "playing nice" What I am saying is: Very shortly we won't have to play at all because we'll just have to give them one mean look and the treasonous swine will run like hell. Sounds Good? For the love of God go to my link below and SIGN UP so we can actually coordinate nationally with consistent effectiveness."[3] Analysts are subscribed to the website and are monitoring any messages sent from the site's coordinator, however, as of January 11, 2021 no updates have been received. Analysts identified that the post was shared across multiple Wimkin pages to include Henry Balsz's, the self-proclaimed Commanding Officer of the 'West Coast Patriots 3%' Group located near Fernley, Nevada.[4] iCOP analysts identified the post above (Image 2) made by 'Vik Freeman' on their Wimkin account on January 10, 2021 which stated "Demand Pelosi be Executed." The post asked viewers to register at the site givemebass[.]com and used the following hashtags of a violent nature: #executethemfortreason, #executepelosi, #firingsquad seen on Image 4 on the right.

Threat to Nancy Pelosi

Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency
Active Shooter Preparedness Webinar

Wednesday, April 7, 2021
10:00 AM EST

THIS IS NOT A TACTICAL TRAINING COURSE

The Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency, Region IV (AL, FL, GA, KY, MS, NC, SC, TN) invites you to join a two-hour security webinar to enhance awareness of and response to an active shooter event.

Preparing employees for a potential active shooter incident is an integral component of an organization's incident response planning. Because active shooter incidents are unpredictable and evolve quickly, preparing for and knowing what to do in an active shooter situation can be the difference between life and death. Every second counts.

Objectives:

- Discuss the elements of active shooter incident response planning with guidance from expert instructors.
- Describe common behaviors, conditions, and situations associated with active shooter events.
- Discuss how to recognize potential workplace violence indicators.
- Provide information about best practices, communications protocols, and resources that will assist stakeholders to develop or enhance their emergency planning, preparedness, and response to active shooter incidents.

Understanding Liability and Risk Exposure

The webinar focuses on providing awareness training that supports the development of emergency action planning capabilities. These capabilities may better position organizations in receiving important legal liability protections from the DHS Support Anti-Terrorism by Fostering Effective Technologies (SAFETY) Act of 2002.

Following the 9/11 attacks, the private sector became very concerned about the risk of liability they would face in the event their product, service, or layered security program (e.g., Technology) was impacted by an act of terrorism. The SAFETY Act seeks to mitigate those risks by encouraging the wide-spread deployment of effective anti-terrorism technologies by providing legal protections that cap or dismiss liability in the event of an act of terrorism.

To learn more about the SAFETY Act and the types of products, services, and layered security programs that have received protections, visit www.safetyact.gov.

Who Should Participate?

This event is open to:

COCAINE-FILLED COLOMBIAN SUBMARINE INTERCEPTED NEAR MEXICAN BEACH

LISTEN TO STORY 1:47

Four drug traffickers from Colombia used a makeshift submarine to move cocaine into Mexican waters this week.

The seizure took place near the beach resort area of Huatulco, Oaxaca, when military forces working coast guard operations intercepted the makeshift submarine, the Mexican Navy revealed. A military surveillance aircraft spotted the submarine and coordinated the capture.

Authorities arrested four men identified only as Colombian nationals. Sailors seized the boat and 106 bundles of cocaine. A total weight for the cocaine remains undisclosed. Mexico's Navy claimed the four suspected drug runners and their equipment would be turned over to the Oaxaca Attorney General's Office for criminal handling.

Mexico's southern beaches are commonly used by South American drug traffickers to smuggle large quantities of cocaine–typically bound for the U.S. border. In many cases, particularly in Michoacán and Jalisco, authorities at the local, state and even federal level are complicit in the smuggling operations.

CISA, NASCAR target Daytona 500 fan safety < Caution-https://homelandprepnews.com/stories/60001-cisa-nascar-target-daytona-500-fan-safety/ > (01/08) Homeland Preparedness News
Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA) and NASCAR officials recently joined Daytona International Speedway personnel, first responders, and law enforcement officials in conducting a Daytona 500 fan safety tabletop exercise. The exercise serves as an example of the planning and coordination occurring before race day on Feb.14 to keep fans safe. "The Daytona 500 is one of the biggest sporting events of the year, and keeping everyone involved safe is an equally big task," CISA Acting Assistant Director for Infrastructure Security Scott Breor said. "CISA has a longstanding relationship with NASCAR and the Dayton 500, and we look forward to continuing to work with them and all our partners throughout the region to do our part to ensure the race is safe and secure."

National Maritime Cybersecurity Plan Includes New Contract Mandates, Intel Sharing < Caution-https://www.hstoday.us/subject-matter-areas/maritime-security/national-maritime-cybersecurity-plan-includes-new-contract-mandates-intel-sharing/ > (01/08) HSToday
The new five-year National Maritime Cybersecurity Plan released by the White House this week focuses on new standards for port owners, shippers, and operators and forthcoming mandates that contractors meet cyber standards. National Security Advisor Robert O'Brien said Tuesday that the plan "articulates how the United States government can buy down the potential catastrophic risks to our national security and economic prosperity created by technology innovations to strengthen maritime commerce efficiency and reliability."

Hospitals thought they'd see Covid-19 vaccine shortages. Sometimes, they have to throw away doses. < Caution-https://www.cnn.com/2021/01/10/health/covid-19-vaccine-unused/index.html > (01/10) CNN
In some hospitals, health centers and pharmacies in the United States, there are vials of Covid-19 vaccines that aren't making it into arms. Out of the more than 22 million doses of vaccine that have been distributed to hospitals and pharmacies so far in the United States, only about 6.7 million people have received their first dose, according to data from the US Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. There's no one reason for the slow rollout or doses going unused; experts say it was never going to be easy to begin a mass vaccination campaign during a pandemic.

The U.S. recorded more than 4,000 Covid-19 deaths in a single day on Thursday, according to Johns Hopkins University data, the highest one-day death toll of the pandemic and a dramatic warning that the nation's Covid crisis is still trending in the wrong direction. Cases and hospitalizations continue to rise, even as millions of vaccine doses ship out across the country. Health networks and emergency services have been drained, and hospitals overcrowded, with more than 132,000 people currently hospitalized across the country, according to The Atlantic's COVID Tracking Project.

Datora will leverage the SBC SWe for both network interconnect and network access use cases.

National Security Implications of Deferred Maintenance in Infrastructure < Caution-https://www.lawfareblog.com/national-security-implications-deferred-maintenance-infrastructure > (01/08) Lawfare
Rome wasn't built in a day, but pieces of infrastructure at the heart of the Roman empire have survived for more than 2,000 years. Though Roman roads were (and are) incredibly resilient, even most ancient structures require periodic maintenance to remain functional. Deferred maintenance of critical infrastructure is a local, state and federal challenge that is a global phenomenon. According to a 2019 report release by the Volcker Alliance, a nonpartisan think tank, deferred maintenance in the United States could already exceed an estimated $1 trillion, or 5 percent of the U.S. gross domestic product. The National Park Service alone accounts for more than $11 billion of deferred maintenance.

U.S. intelligence agencies, including the FBI, the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, the National Security Agency and the Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency, have confirmed that Russia was behind the SolarWinds hack. It is reported that the FBI is investigating whether Russia hacked into project management software JetBrains' TeamCity DevOps tool to originally plant its malware in SolarWinds Orion, causing a cascade of downstream opportunities for Russia to access numerous governmental agencies' systems, as well as thousands of private company systems.

Several organizations, including Microsoft and the U.S. Department of Justice, have disclosed breaches in which suspected Russian state-sponsored hackers exploited the SolarWinds backdoor and gained access to sensitive data. At the same time, other companies such as VMware, Cisco and Intel have disclosed that they received the malicious SolarWinds Orion updates but found no evidence that the backdoor was exploited. As a result, authorities believe the SolarWinds attacks were part of a cyberespionage campaign that targeted specific organizations for intelligence gathering, though events are still unfolding.

SolarWinds is getting help on the massive hack that infected its software and spread to thousands of its government and private sector clients. The Texas-based IT software company has hired Chris Krebs, former director of the US Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency, to consult on the breach. SolarWinds is currently investigating how hackers penetrated its systems and inserted malicious software into an update to the company's popular Orion products.

New SolarWinds CEO Sudhakar Ramakrishna (pictured) struck a different tone in his first public communication just seven days after starting as CEO of the embattled IT infrastructure management vendor. Unlike his predecessor Kevin Thompson, who is an accountant by training and led the firm from March 2010 to December 2020, Ramakrishna comes from a security background, having most recently led Pulse Secure. During his five years as Pulse Secure's CEO, Ramakrishna had to deal with hackers exploiting a widely known flaw in the company's VPN appliance to carry out ransomware attacks many months after a patch had already been rolled out.

The US Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA) said today that the threat actor behind the SolarWinds hack also used password guessing and password spraying attacks to breach targets as part of its recent hacking campaign and didn't always rely on trojanized updates as its initial access vector.The new developments come as CISA said last month in its initial advisory on the SolarWinds incident that it was investigating cases where the SolarWinds hackers breached targets that didn't run the SolarWinds Orion software.

State Department Approves Creation of Cyber Bureau < Caution-https://www.nextgov.com/cybersecurity/2021/01/state-department-approves-creation-cyber-bureau/171276/ > (01/08) Nextgov

Secretary of State Mike Pompeo approved the creation of a new bureau within the department to lead diplomatic efforts on cybersecurity and emerging technology issues. According to a State Department announcement Thursday, the bureau stems from a "need to reorganize and resource America's cyberspace and emerging technology security diplomacy" in response to national security threats posed by China, Russia, Iran, North Korea and other actors. The State Department notified Congress of its intent to create the bureau in June 2019, two years after then-Secretary of State Rex Tillerson announced plans to close the department's cyber coordinator office—which handled similar duties—and shift some of its responsibilities to the Bureau of Economic Affairs.

The Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency says hackers are breaching federal networks by exploiting methods besides the SolarWinds Orion vulnerabilities."Specifically, we are investigating incidents in which activity indicating abuse of Security Assertion Markup Language (SAML) tokens consistent with this adversary's behavior is present, yet where impacted SolarWinds instances have not been identified," according to updated guidance published Jan 6. "CISA is continuing to work to confirm initial access vectors and identify any changes to the tactics, techniques, and procedures (TTPs)."

Top technology trends in the legal profession for 2021 are likely to include artificial intelligence, block chain and cryptocurrencies, autonomous vehicles, digital health, and … court filings on paper. Following a recent widespread cybersecurity breach, the United States federal courts are prohibiting electronic filing of highly confidential documents. Parties must file such documents on paper or as electronic files on a secure electronic device. In mid-December, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency (CISA) issued an emergency directive disclosing a cyberattack to the networks of local, state, and federal agencies, as well as private companies.

Google and Mozilla are each urging users to patch serious vulnerabilities in their respective web browsers, Chrome and Firefox, that could be exploited to allow threat actors to take over users' systems. The security fixes will be rolled out to Windows, Mac, and Linux over the next few days. Importantly, none of the flaws has been spotted as being abused in the wild.The new stable release of Chrome, 87.0.4280.141, brings 16 security fixes; and while the tech giant won't disclose details for all of them until the majority of its userbase has received the updates, it did highlight patches for 13 vulnerabilities that were reported by external researchers.

Missing laptops raise cyber risks from U.S. Capitol mayhem < Caution-https://fortune.com/2021/01/08/capitol-riots-missing-laptops-cyber-risks/ > (01/08) Fortune
Federal authorities are assessing the cybersecurity risks created by rioters roaming freely through congressional offices during Wednesday's rampage at the U.S. Capitol, including missing laptops and computers that were left unsecured. While there is no indication that hacking into computer networks was a goal of the rioters, at least three computers were reported missing and the potential exists that the intruders gained access to sensitive systems when members of Congress and their staff hastily took cover, according to cybersecurity experts. As a result, the House and the Senate should devote resources to mitigating any potential vulnerabilities, they said.

Even during the most expensive, contentious and turbulent election cycle in American history, democracy still prevailed — even in long-controversial Georgia, where the spending, campaigning and rhetoric continued into early January. Voters came out in record numbers despite the raging Covid-19 pandemic and the election's integrity withstood repeated attacks from President Trump and his loyalists, including Wednesday's violent invasion of the Capitol while Congress certified the Electoral College count and Joe Biden's victory.

The months of disinformation on social media generated by President Trump and his allies and supporters about the outcome of the election "is directly tied to the domestic terrorism we saw at the Capitol," says CBS contributor David Becker, an election law expert. Becker said that the storming of the U.S. Capitol Wednesday by pro-Trump rioters who had been spurred on by the president as Congress tallied Electoral College votes was "a shameful episode in American history."

Dominion Voting Systems, one of the biggest election equipment manufacturers in the U.S. and the subject of numerous incoherent conspiracy theories about the 2020 election, has sued lawyer Sidney Powell, who pushed President Donald Trump's attempts to overturn election results, for defamation.

"Powell falsely claimed that Dominion had rigged the election, that Dominion was created in Venezuela to rig elections for Hugo Chávez, and that Dominion bribed Georgia officials for a no-bid contract," the lawsuit states.

New authorities from the recently enacted defense bill are expected to help the U.S. government in its response to the SolarWinds hack believed to be perpetrated by Russia. The annual National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA), which became law this past week after Congress overrode President Trump's veto, formally established a cyber czar position at the White House, in addition to granting numerous other cybersecurity powers that could help the incoming Biden administration respond to the Russian hack.

The Energy Department will prohibit electric utilities serving "critical defense facilities" from using bulk power equipment made by Chinese companies starting on Jan. 16, according to an Energy Department notice published this week. The Energy Department was directed by President Trump in a May 2020 executive order to take steps to secure bulk power systems from foreign adversaries. The prohibition order was announced by DOE on Dec. 17. The Federal Register notice sets up an official deadline and processes to implement the order.

The European Court of Auditors (ECA) seems largely unimpressed by findings from its year-long probe into how European Union (EU) member states are dealing with 5G security. According to Euractiv, the ECA has identified a worryingly divergent approach across different EU nations. Paolo Pesce, part of the ECA team conducting the 12-month review, remarked that although "member states have started to develop and implement necessary security measures to mitigate risks, they seem to be progressing at a different pace."

The U.S.-China relationship will be the great geopolitical rivalry of the early 21st century, and every facet of the competition will involve the two big powers' capabilities in science and technology. Figures from across the political spectrum worry about a technology race with China, and many Americans fear that China has already surpassed us in such frontier technologies as artificial intelligence and 5G broadband communications.

A new trend is emerging among ransomware groups where they prioritize stealing data from workstations used by top executives and managers in order to obtain "juicy" information that they can later use to pressure and extort a company's top brass into approving large ransom payouts. ZDNet first learned of this new tactic earlier this week during a phone call with a company that paid a multi-million dollar ransom to the Clop ransomware gang.

In the spring of last year a number of criminal hacker crews pledged to leave hospitals, nursing homes and other healthcare entities alone until the Covid-19 pandemic passed. At least one ransomware gang saw that as an opportunity. A recent report from Checkpoint Security notes that ransomware attacks against healthcare orgs have jumped about 45% since early November. That followed an alarming 71% spike in October. Checkpoint notes that healthcare entities were actually the number one target of ransomware attacks that month.

She, along with five other police officers, were knocking on doors on residential floors of the easternmost buildings of the block urging people to immediately evacuate and to avoid 2nd Avenue.

United States Merchant Marine Academy Superintendent Receives Third Star

WASHINGTON – Today, Secretary of Transportation Elaine L. Chao promoted U.S. Merchant Marine Academy (USMMA or the Academy) Superintendent, Rear Admiral Jack Buono to Vice Admiral in the U.S. Maritime Service (USMS) at a small ceremony in the Department of Transportation headquarters, Washington, D.C.

"Vice Admiral Buono deserves this third star – he's been a great leader, especially during COVID-19, and has put USMMA at Kings Point on a solid foundation to develop our country's future maritime leaders," said U.S. Transportation Secretary Elaine L. Chao.

Vice Admiral Buono will continue to lead at USMMA, where he has been stationed since joining the Academy in November 2018. The promotion makes Vice Admiral Buono the first USMMA graduate to serve in this position at this rank.

Prior to his appointment as Superintendent, Vice Admiral Buono had nearly 40 years of maritime experience in the private sector. He retired from his last private sector employer in 2016.

"This well-deserved promotion is an indication of the trust and confidence we have in Vice Adm. Buono's leadership in the critical role of preparing our Nation's next generation of leaders – afloat and ashore," said Maritime Administrator Mark H. Buzby. "His steady hand on the wheel continues to steer Kings Point fair."

Vice Admiral Buono is a Master Mariner and a 1978 graduate of the Academy. During his tenure as Superintendent, he has been responsible for implementing the Academy's strategic plan which includes updating institutional culture, governance, communications, infrastructure, academics and athletics. More recently, Vice Admiral Buono has guided the Regiment of Midshipmen and the Academy community through the global health crisis while maintaining a strong focus on accomplishing the mission of the Academy. His inspirational leadership has rallied the entire Academy family – students, faculty, staff, parents, and alumni.

"I am truly humbled and honored by this promotion, and I look forward to continuing to develop the future of this national treasure we call USMMA," said Vice Admiral Buono. "We will continue to press forward with our mission: developing leaders of exemplary character committed to serving the national security, marine transportation and economic needs of this great Nation."

Other recent and significant accomplishments at USMMA under the guidance of Vice Admiral Buono include: the first-ever semi-virtual graduation ceremony for the Class of 2020, the pivot to distance learning during the coronavirus disease 2019 (COVID-19) public health emergency, maintaining at sea training experience for Midshipmen aboard U.S. Flag merchant ships and two state maritime academy training vessels, and the milestone achievement of sending the Regiment of Midshipmen home for the recent holiday break COVID-free.

ABOUT USMMA

The United States Merchant Marine Academy, located in Kings Point, N.Y., educates and graduates leaders of exemplary character who are inspired to serve the national security, marine transportation, and economic needs of the United States as licensed Merchant Marine Officers and commissioned officers in the Armed Forces. President Franklin D. Roosevelt dedicated the Academy, which was established under the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as the United States Merchant Marine Academy in 1943. It is administered by the Maritime Administration < Caution-https://lnks.gd/l/eyJhbGciOiJIUzI1NiJ9.eyJidWxsZXRpbl9saW5rX2lkIjoxMDAsInVyaSI6ImJwMjpjbGljayIsImJ1bGxldGluX2lkIjoiMjAyMTAxMTEuMzMxMTk2ODEiLCJ1cmwiOiJodHRwczovL3d3dy5tYXJhZC5kb3QuZ292LyJ9.mCRmyMdJeReKcgVT4G6RCX_UsqofWBJBodboav8qTec/s/1086151984/br/92933183483-l > under the auspices of the Department of Transportation. < Caution-https://lnks.gd/l/eyJhbGciOiJIUzI1NiJ9.eyJidWxsZXRpbl9saW5rX2lkIjoxMDEsInVyaSI6ImJwMjpjbGljayIsImJ1bGxldGluX2lkIjoiMjAyMTAxMTEuMzMxMTk2ODEiLCJ1cmwiOiJodHRwczovL3d3dy50cmFuc3BvcnRhdGlvbi5nb3YvIn0.6neBgpQ7jIBUPNid27Xnkf3luWU9rjAfPbL_93mDw8I/s/1086151984/br/92933183483-l >

ABOUT THE U.S. MARITIME SERVICE

The United States Maritime Service was established in 1938 under the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 as a voluntary organization to train individuals to become officers and crewmembers on merchant ships. Subsequently, Merchant Mariners moved personnel and supplies into and out of World War II theaters around the globe. Despite their significant contributions to the Allied victory in World War II, USMS training establishments and facilities were deactivated in 1954, and the USMS was, with one exception, dissolved or absorbed into other federal departments. The Secretary of Transportation has the authority, with the approval of Congress, to reactivate the USMS in times of war. The Maritime Administrator is recognized as the Commandant of the USMS.

As the single exception to the deactivation of the USMS, the Secretary of Transportation is afforded the authority to maintain the tradition of uniformed USMS officer presence at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy and the six maritime academies. At USMMA, these uniformed officers include the Superintendent, Deputy Superintendent, Dean, Commandant, company officers, and many of the faculty.

The presence of uniformed USMS officers is an integral part of the regimental and educational system at the Academy. Since 1943, USMMA has implemented a proven developmental system that includes the regiment, academics, athletics and Sea Year to accomplish its mission of developing leaders of exemplary character that are committed to the national security, marine transportation, and economic needs of the United States. Experiencing or exposure to traumatic events during childhood and continuing into adulthood is all too common. Less known is that trauma is a dominant factor in the lives of individuals involved with the criminal justice system; in what occurs while in the system; and in how transitioning and living in the community is impacted. With this increasing awareness, criminal justice professionals are considering what this means in their correctional settings, how to manage this population, and provide effective services. Often overlooked is the challenge of staff who are also affected by trauma in their personal and work lives, as organizational stress and trauma create additional challenges for the workplace.

In this Community Services Division-sponsored webinar series, NIC's Maureen Buell facilitates a stimulating discussion featuring Stephanie Covington, PhD, of the Center for Gender and Justice and Nena Messina, PhD of Envisioning Justice Solutions. This dynamic three part webinar series focuses on the following topics: 1) The Association between ACEs and Criminal Justice Involvement; 2) Trauma Informed Treatment and Theory; and 3) Becoming Trauma Informed and Moving to Trauma Responsive.

As demand outpaced the limited number of registrations, the linked content is now streaming and shareable. The linked content includes the downloadable recorded sessions, a list of resources referenced during the presentations, and a Q&A document that memorializes questions brought up in the chat.
